Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. STENHOLM).

Mr. STENHOLM. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this simple motion calling for some truth in advertising and fiscal honesty in the tax bill.

While we can have honest differences of opinion about the size and structure of the tax cut, we should all be able to shoot straight with the American people about the cost. Unfortunately, it appears that this tax bill will use every budget gimmick in the book, and possibly invent a few more, in order to hide its true cost.

This motion very reasonably asserts that the cost of all tax cuts should be shown honestly and be phased in within 5 years so the costs do not increase dramatically and surreptitiously in later years. The tax bill passed by the other body would delay full implementation of the five most expensive components until 2009 and 2011. More than 70 percent of these costs occur in the second 5 years.

Even worse, the cost of this bill would explode to $4.1 trillion in the next decade, at the very time that the Social Security and Medicare programs will begin to face severe financial challenges with the retirement of the baby boom generation.

This tax bill bets the ranch on surplus projections continuing to grow. If those projections are off just a bit, we will be forced to dip into Medicare trust funds before we even start dealing with the increases for defense or other needs as yet not addressed.

By passing a large backend-loaded gimmick-filled tax cut, we risk returning to the era when deficit spending placed a tremendous drag on our economy and ran up $5.7 trillion worth of debt. Even though I would be delighted to be wrong, I fear we are also squandering our opportunity to strengthen Social Security and Medicare and pay down our national debt.

I do not want my grandchildren to look back 20 years from now and ask why I left them with the tab for tax cutting we will politically enjoy today. I used to think no one else in this body would want to do that either, but I was wrong. The least we owe our grandchildren and the rest of our constituents is a little honesty, and that is what this motion to recommit is all about.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BRADY), a gentleman on the Committee on Ways and Means, lest someone believe that the entire State of Texas, based upon the number of speakers who have come to the mike on the other side of the aisle, is all on one side. I would also hasten to indicate that both the Senators representing the great State of Texas voted for the measure that passed.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. THORNBERRY). The Chair would remind all Members that while it is permissible to comment on a vote in the Senate, it is not permissible, under the precedents of the House and clause 1 of rule XVII, to refer to a particular Senator's vote.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BRADY) for 3 minutes.

Mr. BRADY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

I think the President is taking, and this Republican Congress is taking a very responsible approach to tax relief in America today. The tax relief under this proposal starts slow and it builds. It grows. As we pay off more and more of the public debt, and as the surplus grows, tax relief grows with it. We do not have a budget surplus in Washington, because I guarantee my colleagues that Washington will spend every dime the taxpayers send up here, but we do have an actual tax surplus because people are paying too much into government for what they are getting for it.

There are people I think in Washington who are still out of touch with the real world, who think we just do not tax people enough, and if we did, that would solve everything. But look at the way real families are taxed in America: When they start their day, they get up in the morning and get a roll or a coffee and pay a sales tax; step in the shower, pay a water tax; jump in the car to go to work, pay a fuel tax.

At work, at the office, they pay an income tax and a payroll tax. At the end of the day, they get back and drive to their home, on which they pay property taxes. They open the door, flip on the light and pay an electricity tax; turn on the television, pay a television tax; pick up the phone, pay a telephone tax. If they are married, when they kiss their spouse good night, they pay a marriage penalty tax, and on and on, until at the end of their life, they die and pay a death tax.

No wonder people have such a hard time making it, why there is not enough money left at the end of the month just to meet the needs of their children, just to provide for retirement, for college, and the day-to-day necessities. Washington needs to get out of the way to give people back more of what they have earned, not what Washington has earned. We need to give them the power to make their decisions for their children, for their schools, for their health care, because we are overtaxing real families in America.

In fact, Tax Freedom Day was just a week or so ago, May 3. That means for most of our families, they worked from New Year's Day to May 3 just to pay their taxes, and then they started working for themselves. So they have worked 5 months into the year before they start working for their children, their family, their own American dream.

The Republican tax relief plan, the President's tax relief plan is a responsible one, one that has more faith in our families than in Washington to squander those dollars. I am convinced, and I am a new member of the committee, that our Tax Code is too complex. I do not agree with the instructions here dictating what that bill will do, because I think bipartisan Members from the House and Senate ought to sit down and ought to work through the complexities of this. This is not the time to dictate. This is not the time to destroy the bipartisanship. This is like getting to the end of the marriage vows and the minister starts making things up.

Mr. Speaker, this ought not be the time we do that. Let us keep a strong, steady path and come forward with a bipartisan tax relief bill that we can all be proud of.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. CARDIN) and see if he can explain what the Senate representation from Maryland did, without violating House rules.

Mr. CARDIN. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the gentleman will not be able to refer under the Speaker's admonition how my two Senators voted on this bill; but I think the gentleman will find that they did the right thing.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARDIN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. THOMAS. If the gentleman would indicate his intention on the vote on final passage, we might be able to anticipate a comparison between what his Senators did and what the gentleman is doing.

Mr. CARDIN. Mr. Speaker, it would be very consistent with my Senators.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CARDIN. Mr. Speaker, reclaiming my time, budget reconciliation is supposed to be to reconcile this bill with the budget resolution. And our budget resolution spells out a 10-year number that is available for tax relief.

Our motion to instruct basically says let us be honest about that. Let us be sure that the tax provisions are phased in in a way that it is not backloaded. By backloaded, we mean estate tax relief when it does not take effect for 10 years and then explodes in cost at the same time we have problems in funding the Social Security system and the Medicare system because of the baby-boom generation reaching the age of 65.

Mr. Speaker, this motion is basically truth in advertising. Let us put the provisions in and not backload it and have to pay later.

The second thing is that this reconciliation bill ought to speak to our priorities; and I do not think that our priorities ought to be tax cuts today and tax cuts tomorrow and nothing else. We should speak to the fact that we want to pay down the national debt, that we want to preserve Social Security and Medicare and yes, put more money into education like the overwhelming majority of this body voted to do.

Yet if we do not pass this motion, I am afraid that the reconciliation bill will do what the gentleman from California (Mr. THOMAS), the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, said. That is, he wants to put 15 pounds of sugar in a 10-pound bag. It is going to be 30 pounds of sugar in a 10-pound bag. It will squeeze out our ability to do anything else.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support the motion to instruct.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maryland was not in the room when it was pointed out, notwithstanding his eloquence on the provision, that the phase-in should not exceed longer than 5 years. I do want to remind the gentleman that three times on the floor of the House the Democrats presented a tax plan, and I can provide my colleagues, for example, with some of the numbers. Under the estate tax relief, the language of the Democratic plan said in 2002, relief would be at $2 million; in 2003 and 2004, $2.1 million; in 2005 and 2006, $2.2 million; in 2007 and 2008, $2.3 million; in 2009, $2.4 million; and in 2010 and thereafter, $2.5 million.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gentleman asking us to meet a standard higher than they impose on themselves. I happily accept that challenge. But to indicate that we should meet a standard that the Democratic party did not meet in the Democrat's own program is just a little much to take; and, frankly, it brings into question the sincerity of the motion to instruct and the criteria that are placed in that motion to instruct, which is in fact to hold us to a standard the Democrats chose not to hold their plan to.

Mr. CARDIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. CARDIN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman looks at the Democratic substitute, the gentleman will find that 95 percent of the provisions take effect within the 5-year window. I think that is pretty good. If the gentleman would agree to live up to that 95 percent standard, I think we would be glad to amend our motion.

Mr. Speaker, the point is that we do not want to have the overwhelming majority of revenue hit when we are in the last years of the bill, and the proposals we are talking about may do that. The Democratic substitutes never do.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, continuing on my time, if the gentleman would look at the Democratic tax plan presented on the floor on three different occasions, the single largest dollar amount under one of the major provisions occurred in 2010; the second largest amount in 2009; the third largest amount in 2008, et cetera.

The point is the Democratic substitute is structured similar to everyone else's. The motion to instruct requires us to meet a standard the other side of the aisle chose not to meet themselves on virtually every one of the items they have in their bill.

Mr. Speaker, I understand their desire and what they want. All I am saying is when the other side of the aisle chooses to impose a standard on the majority, I would hope that the minority would have already honored that standard.

Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman would like to be refreshed on what the Democratic tax plan is, it is here and available.

Mr. CARDIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. CARDIN. My recollection is the gentleman is referring to the provisions concerning the estate tax relief. The other provisions were all phased in within the 5-year window, and the dollar amounts in the estate tax in the last few years was a minor amount in the overall effect of the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I would tell our distinguished chairman that the Democrats are entitled to one mistake, for instance, the Senate vote from the State of California today; and we had one provision that phases out over 5 years, and I think almost every provision in the chairman's bill phases out over 10 years. I would give him one free kick if that will solve that issue.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 1½ minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. SHERMAN).

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, focusing on these phase-ins, if only the Republican bill, if only the gentleman would promise that he would come as close to not backend loading the ultimate bill, as we did in our Democratic plan, he would get my vote against this motion. In fact, instead the House bills explode in the second 10 years to a cost of $4.1 trillion.

We need standards and rules for a unipartisanship-led conference dedicated to such extreme mispackaging of a tax bill.

I want to talk to my Republican colleagues and say this motion to instruct could save a lot of heartache back in their districts because there is a new regime in the Senate. There may be 41 Senators opposed to any further tax cuts. If they let a bill go through that is widely publicized as providing constituents with tax relief, and then they open up their tax booklets at the end of the year and they see that you did not take care of the AMT, and the AMT takes back all of the benefits talked about in the speeches, if they see there is no marriage penalty relief or pension reform and their IRA is still $2,000, and if they see the R&D tax credit has been allowed to expire, they are going to ask why was that allowed to occur? Why did we celebrate a tax bill that did not deal with those provisions? And only a vote for this motion to instruct can be my colleague's defense.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. PORTMAN), a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, and a significant contributor to a number of key issues, including the pension and Individual Retirement Account legislation.

Mr. PORTMAN. Mr. Speaker, just looking at the motion to instruct, I find it interesting that the other side is instructing the conferees to include provisions that were not in the Democratic substitute. I have the Democratic substitute in front of me. There is a requirement twice here that the conference report shall include increasing the per child tax credit, for instance, which was not in the Democratic substitute.

We just heard that we need to add all of these things, and yet when the Democrats offered their own tax bill, it was not included.

I see a permanent extension of the research credit must be included. That is an instruction to the conferees, yet the Democrats have no research and development tax credit in their plan.

There is a discussion here of the AMT saying we shall adjust the current law AMT tax so it does not disallow benefits. That is in the House-passed bill in conference. That is something that this House took up as part of the legislation.

It has a number of provisions here saying we must be sure that the revenue laws and associated debt service costs do not exceed Social Security and Medicare in the HI Trust Fund. That is included in our budget resolution and included in the House-passed version. And as the chairman said in the Senate-passed bill today, it does not in fact do that.

Mr. Speaker, I would make the suggestion that the motion to instruct is not consistent with the Democrat's own tax plan that they came forward with.

I would make the further point that despite what we have heard here today on the floor, the budget resolution under which this tax provision is provided does provide for tax relief, but only after taking care of Social Security and Medicare in ways this House has never done.

Mr. Speaker, my colleague is shaking his head, but I have spent 8 years here, and I have watched us raid the Social Security and Medicare Trust Fund. We are setting aside all of those trust fund surpluses for those programs in ways that we have not done before.

We are also providing for debt relief in ways that are unprecedented. We will relieve the country of more of our national debt than we have done ever in this House. All of the available debt will be relieved. We also have increases in spending where appropriate: education spending, defense spending.

Yet after all of that, Social Security and Medicare are being preserved, after the debt being handled in a way that is unprecedented and is appropriate, and after increasing domestic discretionary spending, still because there is a $5.6 trillion tax surplus building up in Washington, there is some room left for the folks paying the bills. That is the roughly 25 or 26 or 27 percent of the surplus that is provided for in the tax relief measure that the Senate passed today.

Incidentally, the Senate passed that bill with 12 Democrat Senators supporting it. And in the House, we had tax bills go through which are part of the larger bill with 58, 68 up to 186 Democrats supporting some of the tax provisions in this underlying legislation which we will have an opportunity to vote on in the next day in the House.

Mr. Speaker, the motion to instruct conferees is not consistent with the Democrats' own tax plan; and it seems to be inappropriate to be instructing conferees to be doing something that was not considered appropriate when the Democrats had an opportunity to offer their own plan.

Mr. Speaker, this does fit within the budget nicely. It provides some tax relief to the hard-working Americans that created every cent of that surplus. It is not only reasonable, it has been bipartisan. Twelve senators supported it today. We have votes here in the House that have been bipartisan on most of the provisions that are in the tax bill before us.

Mr. Speaker, I urge that we defeat the motion to instruct and move on to provide the American people with needed tax relief.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the House rules say about wagering on the House floor, but if the rules were silent, I would be inclined to offer the Republican proponents and my opponents a wager. I would give them, whoever wanted to accept this wager, $1,000 every year that they meet their projected 10-year budget proposal if they would in turn be willing to give me $1,000 for every year in the next 10 years that they do not meet the budget proposal.

I would like to have that memorialized in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and hope that I could collect every year for the next 10, and I think I might leave that open for a while.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 1½ minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Washington (Mr. INSLEE).

Mr. INSLEE. Mr. Speaker, the President offers this tax cut plan as his energy plan. He refuses to do anything about prices of energy, which has gone up a thousand percent on the wholesale electrical market in the State of Washington, but instead offers a few dollars in the tax cut plan. As a short-term response to our energy crisis, this is an abject failure; and I will say why and I will say how.

We live in interesting times. Tomorrow we cannot say who is going to control the U.S. Senate, but we know the oil and gas industry is going to control the White House. As a result of that, every single dollar, every single dollar that my constituents might get next year back from this tax cut, maybe 15 bucks a month for a middle-class family, is going to be eaten up several fold by energy companies. They are going to take that couple bucks from Uncle Sam, and they are going to ship it in their envelope to the energy companies, many of them who happen to be the President's political allies.

Now, at a townhall meeting a guy told me he was cutting his energy use, but his prices were skyrocketing. And he said, JAY, that plan, that tax cut plan, sort of reminds me of a money-laundering operation. One just takes the money, launders it through the taxpayers and gives it over to the President's political allies in the energy industry. Why not just cut out the middleman and just give it all to the energy industry, just cut out the middleman?

That would be wrong because we have people losing jobs today in the State of Washington, 43,000 people losing jobs, and the President and the Republican Party will not act on this. It is a travesty. We should be doing a price cap, a price mitigation plan tonight instead of this bill.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1½ minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. FILNER).

Mr. FILNER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Washington (Mr. INSLEE) showed the truth of this tax bill. The GOP majority, GOP, gas oil and pollution, is going to make sure that when we leave for our recess we have passed a tax bill 40 to 45 percent of which goes to the wealthiest 1 percent of our population.

The people who live in my district in San Diego, California, will get very little out of this tax bill; and whatever they get, as the gentleman from Washington (Mr. INSLEE) said, is going to go directly to Exxon or to Enron or to any one of those energy companies that is bleeding California dry.

We are going to leave town with that tax bill, but we are going to leave town without doing anything for the people in San Diego or the rest of California or the rest of the West.

The chairman of the committee is from California. He knows we are being bled dry. He knows we are paying $70 billion this year for electricity, whereas 2 years ago we paid $7 billion. The demand has not increased significantly. The costs have not increased significantly. Where is that 10-fold increase going? It is going into the 800 percent, 900 percent, 1,000 percent increase in profits by the major oil companies and the major electricity generators of this country, and yet this Congress is not going to act on the issues confronting California.

The people of California ought to be telling the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, solve our crisis. Stop the bleeding in California. Give us a reasonable cost for electricity, and then we can go home and enjoy our vacations.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I want to do two things: one, to respond to the offer of a wager of the gentleman from California (Mr. STARK), and I would tell the gentleman that I would be more than willing to risk $1,000 a year over the next 10 years with one proviso. The gentleman is concerned about whether or not we will honor our budgetary numbers and live within our means. I will tell the gentleman that if he makes sure that the Republicans are in the majority for each of those 10 years, I have no question at all that the gentleman would owe me $1,000 a year.

If, however, included in his wager that the gentleman's party regains the majority, I can assure him the American people are going to lose far more than $1,000 each for the rest of their lives.

So, if the gentleman will assure me of a continued majority of the responsible party that has produced a surplus that we have now, that is not a wager; that is an investment.

I will also tell the gentleman from California (Mr. FILNER), who has repeated this several times, that he is pleading on the floor to stop the bleeding in California. I have to tell my friend, the gentleman from California (Mr. FILNER), it is pretty hard to do it from here because, frankly, the bleeding is a self-inflicted wound.

The gentleman ought to go to Sacramento. His party controls the lower house of the legislature, the upper house of the legislature, and the gubernatorial mansion; and if his party would address supply and demand rather than assuming it is a rock and roll band on the question of delivering energy, California can address its significant level. If California wants to maintain air standards higher than the national level and plead for us to assist them when, in fact, the national level is unsatisfactory for Californians, then I would tell the gentleman once again that this bleeding he cries out for in California is self-inflicted.

Mr. FILNER. The gentleman is here. Would the gentleman from California (Mr. THOMAS) yield to talk about the bleeding in California?

Mr. THOMAS. No, I have no interest in yielding.

Mr. FILNER. * * *

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. THORNBERRY). The gentleman will suspend. Does the gentleman from California (Mr. THOMAS) yield to the other gentleman from California (Mr. FILNER)?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I will tell the gentleman, I am not yielding. I am trying to make a statement in conclusion.

Mr. FILNER. * * *

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will suspend. The gentleman is out of order. The time is controlled by the gentleman from California (Mr. THOMAS).

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, as was pointed out by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. PORTMAN), the majority is always willing to look at motions to instruct if they are, in fact, useful and appropriate. What we have seen during the course of this debate is that the motion to instruct offered by the other side attempts to hold the conference to a time-year standard that they would not hold themselves to, and that beyond that the requirements stated of having to be in this particular tax package are items that they did not hold themselves to.

So it would seem to me that one of the basic standards in examining a motion to instruct to see if it, in fact, is serious and ought to be considered by the majority is to contain provisions which the minority lived up to in its own measure presented on the floor. We found it to be deficient in a number of areas; and, therefore, I would reluctantly urge my colleagues, notwithstanding, I am sure, the meritorious and positive attempt to provide a help to the conference, that we reject this motion to instruct.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1½ minutes to the gentlewoman from Texas (Ms. JACKSON-LEE).

Ms. JACKSON-LEE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I think this debate is about several issues; and, frankly, it is about crafting a conference process by this motion to instruct that would allow us to do some of the things that we say in this House we are committed to.

It is interesting that we just voted on an education bill, leave no child behind; but, frankly, with a $1.6 trillion tax bill out of this House we will leave many children behind.

I want to work with my colleagues from California because I need to say to this House the energy crisis, the energy problem, is not a California problem; it is a national problem. Some of us believe that it is important to have short-term relief, and that short-term relief some agree and some disagree may be to eliminate on a temporary basis the gasoline tax that we have and provide dollars to the highway trust fund in substitute of what we are paying out to the richest Americans in this country.

So the motion to instruct might allow us to craft a tax bill that, one, is addressed in the first 5-year period and, two, protects Social Security and Medicare.

I would hope my colleagues would listen to the fact that we cannot spend a bunch of money and try and solve America's problems. This is a good motion to instruct, and we should bring the tax bill down. It should be a reasonable bill. We need to address the energy problem; and if we do so, we need it with the monies that are now being expended in a wasteful manner, giving away to rich people, rich tax dollars, and not helping those who are in need.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. SPRATT), the distinguished ranking member of the Committee on the Budget, to close the debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. SPRATT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from California (Mr. STARK) for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I do not have a large chart. I simply have this piece of paper which I previously have put in the RECORD. On this one sheet of paper, we show the consequences of the conference agreement that we adopted on the budget and the consequences in particular of the tax cut that we are about to send to conference.

This tax cut will have a cost in the area of $1.3 trillion. When one factors into the budget all of the puts and takes, one starts with $5.610 trillion, it seems that everything is possible. My lord, $5.610 trillion. But if we back out the Social Security surplus and then back out the Medicare surplus, the available surplus for policy actions before tax cuts is substantially less than that. It is about $2.6 trillion.

When one backs out the tax cut, we end up with, after interest adjustments, a contingency reserve of $504 billion. There is $504 billion for policy initiatives, for estimating errors, over a period of 10 years. Now that, too, sounds like a lot of money until we look at the bottom line and see that in the first 5 or 6 years that cushion for errors, that contingency reserve, ranges between $12 billion and $30 billion; never a big number, particularly when we consider this: in the puts and takes that I have just mentioned, in getting to this so-called contingency reserve, this cushion fund, there is no calculation for an increase in education, inflation only. No real spending increase in education at all.

More seriously, more importantly, we have in this budget a placeholder number for national defense. It is $325 billion next year, but everybody knows that Mr. Rumsfeld is now transforming our military and will soon be on the Hill, after this is all done, with a request ranging anywhere from $20 billion to $35 billion next year, and probably $250 billion to $350 billion over the next 10 years at a minimum. Nobody disputes that.

I showed this chart today to Mr. Rumsfeld when he testified before our committee. I told him that what we assumed is that he would be up here next year for at least a $20 billion increase.

Each year thereafter, it was staircased by $5 billion until it reached $50 billion. He did not demur to those numbers.

Here is what happens when we factor in defense at that level and when we also factor in to these calculations, emergency spending, which is at the historic average of about $5 billion to $6 billion a year. Next year, the contingency reserve in 2002 is $12 billion. Defense and emergencies alone will need $15 billion. That means we are back in the red again. In 2003, defense and emergencies will need $24 billion. The contingency reserve is $19 billion. In 2004, defense and emergencies will need $31 billion. The reserve is $24 billion. That is how thin the ice gets as a result of this budget and, primarily, as a result of the proposed tax cuts. That is the risk we are taking.

Furthermore, for those who want to say there is still money left for education, there is no money in here for education over and above inflation. That is already factored into the equation. Once we do the defense budget, there is no room left for policy initiatives. There is nothing set aside for Social Security and Medicare, other than what they will accumulate in their own trust funds.

That is why I am opposed to this budget. It comes too close to the margin, too close for comfort, and leaves no room for error. I think everybody should bear that in mind, because this motion to recommit tonight at least says, let us take the tax bill and try to make it as well-contained as we can within the parameters of the budget we have here. That is the least we can do, is send our conferees to the conference committee and tell them, do a better job than either House has yet done in fitting this tax bill into a budget reality.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. THORNBERRY). Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the motion to instruct.

The question is on the motion to instruct offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. STARK).

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 198, nays 210, not voting 24, as follows:

Mr. HOLT changed his vote from "nay" to "yea."

So the motion to instruct was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. THORNBERRY). Without objection, the Chair appoints the following conferees: Messrs. THOMAS, ARMEY, and RANGEL.

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous material on H.R. 1836.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION WAIVING REQUIREMENT OF CLAUSE 6(a) OF RULE XIII WITH RESPECT TO CONSIDERATION OF CERTAIN RESOLUTIONS

Mr. REYNOLDS, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report on the resolution (H. Res. 147) waiving a requirement of clause 6(a) of rule XIII with respect to consideration of certain resolutions reported from the Committee on Rules, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

WELCOMING HIS HOLINESS KAREKIN II, SUPREME PATRIARCH AND CATHOLICOS OF ALL ARMENIANS, ON HIS VISIT TO UNITED STATES AND COMMEMORATING 1700TH ANNIVERSARY OF ACCEPTANCE OF CHRISTIANITY IN ARMENIA

Mr. CANTOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on International Relations be discharged from further consideration of the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 139) welcoming His Holiness Karekin II, Supreme Patriarch and Catholicos of All Armenians, on his visit to the United States and commemorating the 1700th anniversary of the acceptance of Christianity in Armenia, and I ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, I would like to make a few observations concerning this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my colleague, the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. WICKER) and others in extending a warm and sincere welcome to His Holiness, Karekin II, Supreme Patriarch and Catholicos of All Armenians.

His Holiness' visit to the United States is a monumental occasion for the American Armenian community and for Armenians everywhere. His visit marks the 1,700th anniversary of Christianity in Armenia. I want to congratulate the Armenian people on carrying this proud tradition through 17 centuries.

This important resolution shows the support and good will that the United States Congress has towards the Armenian people everywhere and here in this country.

I believe that this resolution spells out important positions of the U.S. Congress. It commends the richness of the Armenian heritage, and it celebrates the contribution of Armenian Americans to the cultural diversity of our Nation.

I want to note the strength and the perseverance of this tradition. For over 70 years, the Armenian Christian faith was suppressed in the Soviet Union, and Armenian religious leaders were imprisoned or exiled. Today, after more than 70 years of Communist rule, Armenians in Armenia have been able to return to practicing their faith.

I want to thank my colleague for introducing this resolution, and I urge all of my colleagues to join me in supporting it.

Mr. WICKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANTOS. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WICKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend, the gentleman from California, for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I am also pleased to rise in favor of House Concurrent Resolution 139, which I introduced only a few days ago with strong bipartisan support.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to thank the leadership for recognizing the importance of this resolution and ensuring its speedy consideration.

We welcome his Holiness Karekin II, Supreme Patriarch and Catholicos of All Armenians, on his visit to the United States. We commemorate the 1700th anniversary of Armenia's acceptance of Christianity.

The Catholicos' visits and upcoming commemoration of the United States provides the ideal opportunity for the House to bring attention to the shared values and ideals of the United States, Armenia, and the Armenian church.

The Armenian people have lived in their homeland for more than 3,000 years, creating a unique civilization rich in culture. The Christian world's links to the past are intertwined with the Armenian church.

In fact, two of Jesus' disciples, Saint Thaddeus and Saint Bartholomew introduced Christianity in Armenia and were among the original founders of the Armenian Church.

In 301 AD, Saint Gregory the Illuminator brought Christianity to the entire country, leading Armenia to declare Christianity the official religion, making it the first Christian state in the world.

The Armenian Church has made great contributions often during times of strife and oppression as my friend from California (Mr. LANTOS) has pointed out, over the last 17 centuries.

Armenian Church leaders opened schools, cared for the sick and needy, and created an alphabet for Armenia and the Republic of Georgia in order to make scriptures more accessible to the people.

Armenians' devotion to God led them to create distinctive styles of manuscript illumination, architecture, sculpture, and textiles that are recognized as masterpieces of Christian art and as major contributions to world art. The Armenian Church continues to make significant contributions today through its ministry at home and its active participation in ecumenical bodies uniting Christians of all denominations throughout the world.

Mr. Speaker, in the coming days, more than 100 communities around the United States will be celebrating this great anniversary with special worship and ecumenical services. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to author this resolution welcoming the Catholicos to the United States and honoring the 1700th anniversary of Christianity in Armenia.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this resolution and affirming our strong ties and relationship with Armenia and the Armenian Church.

Mr. BONIOR. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to welcome the world leader of the Armenian Church, Catholicos Karekin II, Supreme Patriarch and Catholicos of All Armenians, to celebrate the 1700th anniversary of Armenia's conversion to Christianity. His Holiness is a great moral and spiritual leader and it is an honor to have him as a guest in our country.

In 301 A.D., Armenia became the first Christian state in the world. At the time, Saint Gregory the Illuminator Christianized the entire country of Armenia, was consecrated the first Catholicos of Armenia, and baptized King Drtad of Armenia as a Christian. Consequently, King Drtad declared Christianity to be the official religion of Armenia.

Throughout our nation, Armenian communities will celebrate the 1700th anniversary of the coming of Christianity in Armenia with special worship and ecumenical services. On this day, we join the Armenian community, and His Holiness in celebrating the ideals and values shared by the people of the United States, the people of Armenia, and the Armenian Church in America.

It is truly a rare opportunity to have an important world religious leader such as His Holiness here with us to share his wisdom. His Holiness is accompanied by a large delegation consisting of the Supreme Council's members and high-ranking clergy. Mr. Speaker, I'm sure you join me in wishing His Holiness Karekin II, and the delegation, the best on his first official pontifical tour of the United States.

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. THORNBERRY). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

ADDITIONAL MEASURES WITH RESPECT TO PROHIBITING THE IMPORTATION OF ROUGH DIAMONDS FROM SIERRA LEONE—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 107-75)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on International Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to section 204(b) of the International Emergency Economic Powers Act, 50 U.S.C. 1703(b) (IEEPA), and section 301 of the National Emergencies Act, 50 U.S.C. 1631, I hereby report that I have exercised my statutory authority to expand the scope of an existing national emergency in response to the unusual and extraordinary threat posed to the foreign policy of the United States by the Government of Liberia's complicity in the illicit trade in diamonds from Sierra Leone by the insurgent Revolutionary United Front of Sierra Leone (RUF) and by the Government of Liberia's other forms of support for the RUF. I also have exercised my statutory authority to issue an Executive Order that prohibits the importation into the United States of all rough diamonds from Liberia, whether or not such diamonds originated in Liberia. These actions are mandated in part by United Nations Security Council Resolution 1343 of March 7, 2001.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in consultation with the Secretary of State, is authorized to issue regulations in exercise of my authorities under the IEEPA and the United Nations Participation Act, 22 U.S.C. 287c, to implement this prohibition. All Federal agencies are also directed to take actions within their authority to carry out the provisions of the Executive Order.

I am enclosing a copy of the Executive Order I have issued. The Order was effective at 12:01 a.m. eastern daylight time on May 23, 2001.

I have authorized these measures in furtherance of Executive Order 13194 of January 18, 2001, and in response to the Government of Liberia's continuing facilitation of and participation in the RUF's illicit trade in diamonds from Sierra Leone and its other forms of support for the RUF. The Government of Liberia's actions in this regard constitute an unusual and extraordinary threat to the foreign policy of the United States because they directly challenge United States foreign policy objectives in the region and the rule-based international order that is crucial to the peace and prosperity of the United States.

In Executive Order 13194, President Clinton responded to the RUF's illicit arms-for-diamonds trade that fuels the brutal, decade-long civil war in Sierra Leone by declaring a national emergency and, consistent with United Nations Security Council Resolution 1306, by prohibiting the importation into the United States of all rough diamonds from Sierra Leone except for those importations controlled through the certificate of origin regime of the Government of Sierra Leone. In a report issued on December 14, 2000, the United Nations Panel of Experts established pursuant to resolution 1306 found that diamonds represent a major and primary source of income for the RUF to sustain and advance its military activities; that the bulk of the RUF diamonds leaves Sierra Leone through Liberia; and that such illicit trade cannot be conducted without the permission and involvement of Liberian government officials at the highest levels. The Panel recommended, among other things, a complete embargo on all diamonds from Liberia until Liberia demonstrates convincingly that it is no longer involved in the trafficking of arms to, or diamonds from, Sierra Leone.

On March 7, 2001, the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1343 to impose sanctions against the Government of Liberia. The resolution determined that the Government of Liberia's active support for the RUF in Sierra Leone and other armed rebel groups in neighboring countries constitutes a threat to international peace and security in the region and decided that all states shall impose an immediately arms embargo on Liberia and also shall impose travel and diamond bans on Liberia on May 7, 2001, unless the Council determined before that date that the Government of Liberia had ceased its support for the RUF and for other armed rebel groups and, in particular, had taken a number of concrete steps identified in the resolution. In furtherance of this resolution, the Secretaries of State, Commerce, and Defense have taken steps, under their respective authorities, to implement the arms embargo.

With regard to the travel ban and diamond embargo, the Government of Liberia has failed, notwithstanding the two-month implementation period granted by resolution 1343, to honor its commitments to cease its support for the RUF and other armed rebel groups. As a result, the Security Council did not determine that Liberia has complied with the demands of the Council.

In Proclamation 7359 of October 10, 2000, President Clinton suspended the entry as immigrants and non-immigrants of persons who plan, engage in, or benefit from activities that support the RUF or that otherwise impede the peace process in Sierra Leone. The application of that Proclamation implements the travel ban imposed by resolution 1343.

Finally, for the reasons discussed above and in the enclosed Executive Order, I also have found that the Government of Liberia's continuing facilitation of and participation in the RUF's illicit trade in diamonds from Sierra Leone and its other forms of support for the RUF contribute to the unusual and extraordinary threat to the foreign policy of the United States described in Executive Order 13194 with respect to which the President declared a national emergency. In order to deal with that threat, and consistent with resolution 1343 and this finding, I have taken action to prohibit the importation into the United States of all rough diamonds from Liberia, whether or not such diamonds originated there, in order to contribute to the international effort to bring a prompt end to the illicit arms-for-diamonds trade by which the RUF perpetuates the tragic conflict in Sierra Leone. This action, as well as those discussed above, also expresses our outrage at the Government of Liberia's ongoing contribution to human suffering in Sierra Leone and other neighboring countries, as well as its continuing failure to abide by international norms and the rule of law.

GEORGE W. BUSH.
THE WHITE HOUSE, May 23, 2001.

SPECIAL ORDERS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the Speaker's announced policy of January 3, 2001, and under a previous order of the House, the following Members will be recognized for 5 minutes each.

A LOOK BACK AT THE BATTLE OF IWO JIMA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BURTON) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, everybody knows about Iwo Jima and the horrible battle that took place there back in 1945.

This weekend an organization called Freedom Alliance is going to have a number of specials on this on the Fox News Channel, and I hope all of my colleagues have a chance to see this.

The Freedom Alliance founder and Honorary Chairman, Lieutenant Colonel Oliver North, will be hosting a 60-minute documentary this weekend on the Fox News channel outlining the bloody battle, Iwo Jima during World War II.

He will interview survivors from Iwo Jima and Marines who played crucial roles in the pivotal battle in the Pacific for the special which is entitled War Stories with Oliver North.

This will air three times on the Fox News channel over Memorial Day weekend. I urge all of my colleagues to watch. The times and dates are as follows: on Saturday, May 26 at 10 p.m. Eastern; 7 p.m. Pacific it will be on; Sunday, May 27, 8 p.m. Eastern; 5 p.m. Pacific; and Monday, May 28, noon Eastern, 9 a.m. Pacific.

The battle for Iwo Jima which was fought during February and March of 1945 was one of the bloodiest battles of World War II, nearly 7,000 U.S. military personnel lost their lives and 16,000 were wounded. Most of them were Marines.

Mr. Speaker, when the island was secured on February 23, 1945, five Marines and one Navy Corpsman raised the Stars and Stripes on Mt. Suribachi, the highest point on the island. Associated Press photographer Joe Rosenthal captured the historic moment on film and the Marines Corps War Memorial, which now stands at the north end of Arlington National Cemetery in Washington, was sculpted from that famous photograph.

This fascinating and informative television special this weekend is worth all of our time. I hope my colleagues will watch it.

On this Memorial Day, Oliver North and the Freedom Alliance salute all the men and women of our Armed Forces whose lives were taken in the defense of America's liberty. We continue to pray also for the safety of our soldiers, sailors, airmen and Marines who serve today.

Mr. Speaker, I hope all of my colleagues will take the time this weekend to watch this very important.

REBUTTING ARGUMENTS OF MOTION TO INSTRUCT ON H.R. 1836

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. SHERMAN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Madam Speaker, I rise to use these 5 minutes to rebut some of the recent comments of the gentleman from California (Mr. THOMAS), chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

He stood here and he urged that the House not vote for the motion to instruct put forward by the Democratic side. His argument was that that motion committed this House to provide for alternative minimum tax relief, marriage penalty relief, R&D credit extension, and that the Democratic tax alternative had not provided for each of those items.

Let me put it into context. The Democrats came here with an alternative that provided only $750 billion. It sounds odd, only $750 billion, but that is a much smaller sum than the $1.35 trillion that the Republican tax bill provides.

My colleagues can be certain that if we Democrats had thought the country could afford a $1.35 trillion tax cut, that we would not have left out AMT relief, and we would never come to this floor and give with the right hand income tax relief and then take it back with the alternative minimum tax, the portions of the Internal Revenue Code that do not apply to many Americans today, but will apply under the tax bill brought forward by the majority.

We Democrats would not come with a $1.35 trillion tax cut that left out pension reform or left out the R&D tax credit. A number of Republicans did not vote for that motion to instruct, but I urge them to work behind the scenes to make sure that the conference follows those instructions, otherwise that conference will be tempted to put virtually all of that $1.35 trillion in tax relief in the hands of the wealthiest 1 percent of Americans and to leave out pension reform, to leave the IRAs at a mere 2K instead of the $5,000 that should be allowed.

That conference committee will be tempted to leave out marriage penalty relief or to leave ordinary working families subject to an alternative minimum tax that was never designed to apply to them. That conference committee may be tempted to do so because they will believe that they can provide $1.35 trillion in tax relief to the very wealthy and then come back again with another tax cut bill for the AMT and another tax cut bill to extend the R&D tax credit, but beware, the Senate may be in other hands very soon.

We may have a majority leader who says that $1.35 trillion is all the tax relief that America can afford. We may have 41 Senators not willing to end debate on any bill that expands that tax cut to way beyond what is prudent. So the tax bill my colleagues vote for today or tomorrow or at the end of this week may be the only tax relief bill you vote for. If that bill provides only huge cuts to the very wealthy and does not deal with the AMT and the R&D tax credit, does not provide any estate tax relief, although I think my colleagues can be pretty sure it will in that one area, if that one bill leaves the IRA at a mere 2K, then my colleagues' constituents will say we heard about the big tax cut, where is ours?

My colleagues will have to say I did not vote for the Democratic motion to instruct, and we ended up with a $1.3 trillion tax cut that left you out. I could have done something about it, but I did not because I wanted to stick with my party.

We may only have one tax cut bill this year. We may have only one tax cut bill this Congress, and I hope that those on the other side will work behind the scenes, will have access to the bipartisan conference that is really drawing the tax bill, and will say do not leave these critical elements out and do not assume that you can feast on appetizers now and eat the meal later.

The diet only provides for $1.35 trillion in tax cuts, but then the gentleman from Kern County went on to make some statements not about the motion to recommit but rather about the energy crisis in California. And I am sure he will be here tomorrow to explain or retract his remarks, but he said that California should not get any relief because our wounds are self-inflicted.

Do not join the California haters, allow California to regulate the wholesale price of electricity and do not say that our people should suffer on the theory that our wounds are self-inflicted. We will be back an hour from now to detail this energy crisis and explain how the wounds of California are inflicted upon us by mega-corporations based in Texas and the only mistake we made was to trust, to trust those companies who are now taking advantage of this situation.

COMMENDING WESTERN WISCONSIN COMMUNITY VOLUNTEERS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KIND) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. KIND. Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise this evening to honor the many flood relief volunteers who have worked tirelessly these past few weeks throughout my home congressional district along the Mississippi River in western Wisconsin. Through their many acts of selfless dedication, they rose as one to meet the challenges of adversity brought on by the flooding waters.

In fact, Madam Speaker, Tawni and I are kind of redefining the term "feel your pain," because on Easter morning, Tawni and I and our two little boys, Johnny and Matt, woke up to discover that the Mississippi River was to the east of us rather than to the west of us. We thought now may be a good time to load the boys in a canoe and paddle to high ground to seek safe shelter elsewhere. In fact, many of the church bulletins on Easter morning read "He has risen and so has the river."

While some of us had to temporarily leave our houses and others lost possessions, I believe all of us gained something very valuable being witness to the extraordinary efforts made by friends, neighbors and strangers alike, all helping each other in a shared time of need.

Madam Speaker, I would like to specifically commend both the American Red Cross, who provided over 10,000 meals to residents, emergency workers, and volunteers, as well as providing much-needed temporary shelter for those displaced from their homes, as well as the Salvation Army, who provided additional assistance by preparing meals for weary workers and residents.

In addition, I wish to recognize the men and women of Wisconsin's fire departments, police departments, the National Guard, and all other emergency personnel who worked unceasingly to pump the water out and man the barriers to stem the force of the flooding.

Madam Speaker, lastly, the faith I have always had in our Nation's youth proved to be well founded when the students from the Challenge Academy at Fort McCoy, Fountain City High School, Winona High School, Boscobel and Prairie du Chien High School, as well as students at the University of Wisconsin La-Crosse, Winona State University, and a number of other schools spent their time and, for some, their spring breaks to help fill and stack sandbags and man the dikes and levees during this time of need.

Madam Speaker, the multitude of ways residents of western Wisconsin found to help each other was truly inspiring. It is at times like these when one better appreciates what Wisconsin people are all about. There is still work to be done to recover from this year's flooding and to assure that we are well prepared if such events occur in the future, but we know that the community spirit fostered by the acts of generosity and the selflessness by people of Wisconsin's Third Congressional District will be long remembered long after the mighty Mississippi returns to its gentle and peaceful pace.

I wish to also extend thanks to community leaders who reacted quickly and effectively to control the flooding and provide aid to those directly affected by it.

Special thanks need to go out to the mayors of these water communities, as well as county emergency government officials, who made advanced flood preparation and coordinated relief efforts as possible.

I especially want to recognize a few individuals by name: Crawford County Emergency Government Director Roger Martin; Grant County Emergency Director Steve Braum; La Crosse County Emergency Director Al Spalding; La Crosse Public Works Director Pat Caffrey; Trempealeau County Emergency Government Director William Zagorski, who had just started the job 2 weeks prior to the flooding. Talk about getting your feet wet in a new position. Buffalo County Emergency Director Monica Herman, Pierce County Emergency Director Myrna Larrabee, Vernon County Management Director Cindy Ackerman, St. Croix Emergency Management Director Jack Colvard, and Pepin Emergency Management Director John Egli.

All served the people of western Wisconsin extremely well, and I extend my gratitude to them.

Much appreciation and thanks go out to the members of the community and of the region who pulled together during the time of need. It truly was inspiring seeing how people in a particular region can really come together for a common cause.

PEACE OFFICER DEATHS IN HARRIS COUNTY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. GREEN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Texas. Madam Speaker, I rise today with a heavy heart to talk about recent events in my hometown of Houston. On Tuesday, May 22, while we were in session, the law enforcement community suffered several tragedies.

First, during routine investigation of a dispute over damage to a car between a brother and sister, Harris County Sheriff's Deputy Joseph Dennis was killed. Deputy Dennis, while responding to the complaint, was informed that the brother had just driven through the area. He proceeded to pursue the young man, and, in the process of apprehending him, was shot while attempting to handcuff the assailant.

The suspect fled the scene, but was tracked down later in the evening and arrested with the murder weapon, the deputy's weapon, and the handcuffs still in place on his left wrist.

Later that evening, Houston Police Officers Albert Vasquez and Enrique Duharte-Tur, two of several officers working off-duty jobs as security guards at an apartment complex, were shot while apprehending five suspects in drug-related charges.

Officer Vasquez was killed instantly while Officer Duharte-Tur remains hospitalized in critical condition. The suspect in this killing was also wounded and apprehended at the scene.

Additionally, last Sunday, May 19, HPD Officer Carlton Jones was killed when his vehicle flipped over while on a routine patrol in my congressional district.

These deaths are in addition to the loss of Harris County Deputies Oscar Hill, J. C. Risley, and Barret Hill, all of whom were killed in separate incidents in the line of duty over the last 11 months in Harris County.

Harris County, where Houston is located, is leading the Nation in the grim category of peace officers killed according to the National Law Enforcement Officers' Fund.

This recent spate of fatalities comes a week after Congress highlighted the dangers that the men and women of law enforcement face every day with National Police Officers' Week and National Peace Officers' Memorial Day. It serves as a reminder of the bravery and dedication of those who put their lives on the line to protect our families, our homes, and our communities.

Peace officers and their families know better than anyone the perils and risks involved in their job. Yet every day, they put on a badge and make our Nation a safer place.

While we should never forget these officers, we also need to remember their spouses, their children and friends who miss them dearly. Our hearts go out to those survivors who are trying to cope with saying goodbye to a loved one. We are indebted to the survivors for the courage of these officers, and we share their grief and offer kind words knowing that it is a poor substitute for their loss.

Every day, ordinary men and women make an extraordinary commitment when they put on a badge that symbolizes the oath they take to protect and serve. The badge also makes them a target. Every day, they leave their families behind not knowing if they will come home tonight.

Madam Speaker, I invite my colleagues to join me as a cosponsor of H.R. 94, the Law Enforcement Officers' Flag Memorial Act of 2001. This legislation seeks to honor slain law enforcement officers by providing their families a Capitol-flown U.S. flag.

In the meantime, Congress should continue to make sure that we keep our commitment to the law enforcement community by providing funding for more officers, better equipment, and advanced training. It not only saves the lives of officers, but it makes our families, our homes, and our neighborhoods a safer place.

GLOBAL WARMING AND THE KYOTO PROTOCOL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the Speaker's announced policy of January 3, 2001, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SMITH) is recognized for 60 minutes as the designee of the majority leader.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Madam Speaker, I thank the Speaker for this opportunity to address the House and join my colleagues to talk about global warming, to talk specifically about the Kyoto Protocol and the language that is currently in the bill of the Committee on International Relations, the authorizing bill for the State Department to implement the Kyoto Protocol.

I am disappointed that there was not an amendment on the floor to take that particular amendment out of this legislation, because I think the consequences of implementing the Kyoto Protocol are so dramatic that it deserves a discussion before this House. That is why we have joined in this special hour to talk about the consequences if America was to implement the Kyoto Protocol. It is a bad deal for America, and the conferees should examine the implementation language in this bill.

Let me just say that, under this protocol, by 2008 to 2012, the U.S. would be required to slash emissions of greenhouse gases to 7 percent below the 1990 level. That level was last achieved in 1979. Based on projections of the future growth in U.S. energy use, this would require a real cut in emissions of over 30 percent. In the meantime, major greenhouse gas emitters, such as China, India, Mexico, Brazil, would be able to continue business as usual.

Let me just review the numbers of the total income in this country. The GDP in 1979, it was four trillion eight hundred sixty-nine. Today the GDP, or the total income, the total production of this country is nine trillion one hundred ninety-three.

So based on that kind of efficiency that we had back in 1979, we would have to cut the gross domestic product, the output of this country in half. Of course we have increased our energy efficiency a little bit so, not totally half. But a dramatic change.

So what we are going to be discussing tonight is how scientific is the evidence of global warming, how good is the scientific evidence of how much man contributes to that global warming.

Madam Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BARTON), one of the experts in this area who is the chairman of the Subcommittee on Energy and Air Quality to start off our discussion tonight.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Madam Speaker, I sincerely appreciate the gentleman from Michigan having this Special Order at the request of the leadership. I think it is important to air the issue, so to speak, as we get into this debate.

I am an official observer to the Council of Parties operating under the auspices of the United Nations. I was in Kyoto. I was in Buenos Aires. I was in Hague. I am planning at the moment to be in Bonn, Germany in July.

I think there are some things that we need to make sure that the American people know about this. First of all, the economy that will be most affected in the entire world community, if we would implement this, is the United States economy.

As the gentleman from Michigan pointed out, China, whose VOC emissions will exceed the United States within the next 10 years, would have to make no reductions. Mexico, which is a growing economy and our partner in NAFTA, would not have to make any reductions because they are considered to be a developing nation. India, the second most populous nation in the world, again with growing VOC emissions, would have to make no reductions because they are considered again to be a developing nation.

So when we get right down to it, the Western European community, because the collapse of communism occurred after the base year that they are using to calculate the reductions, would make few, if any, because they have shut down the old coal plants in the Soviet Union and in behind the Iron Curtain. In Western Europe, they have gone more and more to nuclear power. So they have to make no reductions in their economy. It would be the good old U.S. of A. that would have to make these reductions.

Under the protocol, a steel plant operating in Pennsylvania or in Illinois or in Indiana that would have to be shut down under the protocol, one could take it bolt by bolt, piece by piece, dismantle it, ship it to China or ship it to Mexico, put it back together, that same plant with the same emissions, and would be perfectly legal under the Kyoto Protocol.

For that reason, it is not just Republicans like the gentleman from Michigan and I that oppose this. Good solid labor union Democrats like the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DINGELL) strongly oppose this. In fact, when they did the Byrd-Hagel amendment in the United States Senate, it passed 98 to 2 that we cannot implement Kyoto unless certain changes are made so that it does not negatively affect the United States economy.

Second thing that the citizens of the United States need to understand about Kyoto is that the science is not settled. In fact, 2 years ago, 15,000 of the most eminent environmental scientists in the United States signed their names to a letter that I believe was sent to the President. It may have been sent to the Members of Congress.

Fifteen thousand scientists said do not implement Kyoto because the science is not settled.

Just within the last 6 months, research based on actual data in the Atlantic Ocean has come out that says the whole concept of global warming may be exactly wrong, could be totally 180 degrees wrong.

So there are all kinds of reasons for us to take a go-slow approach on this. And I think that President Bush, when he said the Kyoto agreement would not be ratified, did exactly the right thing. I think the President and Secretary of State are going to work with Environmental Protection Agency and the Department of Energy to develop a new mechanism for environmental negotiations, not based on Kyoto, but based on sound science and based on economic interests of the United States vis-a-vis the rest of the world.

I would think within the next year or so we will come up with a different mechanism that actually will enhance the environment and will enhance the world community. But the Kyoto agreement, as it is currently structured, is totally flawed. It would be very disadvantageous to the United States. And unless we want to go back to the economy like it was in the 1970s, as the gentleman pointed out, this is exactly the wrong agreement and should not be implemented in this country.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I joined the gentleman from Texas at the Hague, and what the Kyoto Protocol did is it left a lot of the details of implementation to further negotiations. One of the questions at the Hague was the so-called "sinks," the sequestration of the CO₂, and this chart, I think, demonstrates why the United States was trying to insist that sinks be a consideration in emissions. As we see by this chart, this is North America, and the red indicates the amount of CO₂ emissions. The blue at the bottom displays the sequestration, or the sinks, how much of the CO₂ we capture by our corn and our sorghum and our field crops and our woodlands. And when we compare that with Europe and the whole Eurasian and North African area, we can see that the amount of emissions of CO₂ greatly exceeds the amount they sequester.

It seems to me this was one of the reasons that Europe said, well, no, we cannot allow you any credit for sequestering those.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. If the gentleman will continue to yield, this whole concept of sinks was something that back in the mid 1990s, when we began to negotiate Kyoto, was not even a variable. People had not even thought of this. And then, when it became apparent that our forestlands and our grasslands actually consumed CO₂ and that we could be a country that on a net basis emitted no CO₂ because we had large pinewood forests in the south and hardwood forests in the north and the grasslands and the cornfields in the Midwest, this caused consternation in the international environmental community, because under the very mechanism that they had negotiated, the United States, in their mind, walked away free.

So as the gentleman pointed out, at the Hague this was the subject of intense negotiations to minimize the impact of sinks. But again, the sink is an issue that, using their terminology and their models and their variables, the United States should get tremendous amounts of credit, which is, again, one of the reasons this is a flawed process, because they have not really thought the science through.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It seems to me that rather than negotiating in good faith, a lot of the countries of the world, but maybe particularly in Europe, seemed to be more willing to use the treaty as a way to reduce our competitive position. Do you think there is merit there to that?

Mr. BARTON of Texas. There is a train of thought that this would be a surrogate system to put the United States at a competitive disadvantage vis-a-vis the rest of the world.

Now, do not hold me specifically to these numbers, because I do not have some of my briefing books before me as we engage in this special order, but my recollection is that of all the nations in the world that are involved in the Kyoto agreement, and it is around 160 to 170, there would be only 13 that would have to make any significant reductions in their emissions, and of that, the United States would be a huge majority.

So nations like Iceland would have to make some reduction, Japan, Great Britain, Australia, the United States, there were a total of 13 out of 162, but over half the reduction would come from the United States economy.

I have to exit, but I want to tell the gentleman I appreciate his taking this special order, and I think it is very timely and very important that the American people understand some of the facts and figures the gentleman is going to present.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me add my birthday wishes to your daughter, where I understand you are going.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Kristen Barton is 19 today. Her birthday party is going on as I speak. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The gentleman from Texas mentioned that a lot of individuals, Republicans and Democrats, questioned moving ahead with the Kyoto Protocol. In fact, in July of 1997, before the Kyoto Protocol was agreed to, the U.S. Senate passed what they called the Byrd-Hagel resolution, which says that the U.S. should not be signing any treaty that, one, would mandate reductions in greenhouse gas emissions for developed countries but not developing countries; and, two, would result in a serious economic harm to the Nation. And of course the Kyoto Protocol moves in both of these directions. It does not include countries for any reduction, such as China, India, Mexico, Brazil, and many other developing countries. It seems to me this common sense resolution, which was approved by a Senate vote of 95 to 0, set the minimal parameters for Senate ratification of any treaty.

And with no realistic idea that a treaty was going to be signed and eventually ratified by the Senate, which it has to be ratified for it to work, the Bush administration said let us move ahead and make sure we reduce our CO₂ emissions, reduce our greenhouse gases, but let us be very careful about signing on to a treaty that is demanding almost the impossible. And although many European governments have expressed bitter disappointment about the U.S. decision, it should be pointed out that Romania is the only developed country in the whole world that so far has ratified the treaty.

At this time, Madam Speaker, I am going to yield to another leader in this area, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. PETERSON), who was a leader in trying to introduce an amendment to take this language out of this particular authorizing legislation for the State Department.

Mr. PETERSON of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman from Michigan and am delighted to join him here this evening. This has been an interesting issue, because during the last administration, and my friend from Michigan will agree with this, each and every department of government almost had a budget to promote global warming in the Kyoto Treaty. It was very cleverly done. Billions of dollars were spent selling the concept of global warming; that it was a fact, when, in reality, it has been based on computer models. It has not been sound science.

But just to back up for a few years, in 1977, when we were at the height of some cold weather, there is an article here in Newsweek, about seven or eight pages long, called "The Deep Freeze." They talk in here about the beginning of the Ice Age. Because we had a couple of real cold winters in a row, they were talking and they were predicting here that by the year 2000 how the colder climate was going to be moving further south and limiting agricultural ability in this country. The same people are now the ones that are screaming global warming and the oceans will rise as the ice melts and all will be catastrophe.

It is interesting in the last couple of years, and we know most Americans get their news from television, but according to a recent media study, the major networks are biased in their coverage on this subject. And if we think about it, they really are. The study of Media Research Center's Free Market Project states for the three big networks' nightly newscasts, not a single comment from a global warming skeptic for 3 months. That is beyond bias, because this issue has been getting a lot of ink. The numbers clearly show that, with the exception of Fox News Channel, the nightly newscasts have become advocates for the environmental extremist cause. Our findings come as scientists with impeccable credentials, and no particular political axe to grind, such as Dr. Sally Baliunas of Harvard, Smithsonian Center for Astrophysics, or Dr. Richard Lindzen of MIT, concur that the science of global warming is very much unsettled, flawed, and, in many cases, exaggerated.

During this same time, I am pleased that two people from my district have written me in the month of May. A gentleman here who says, "I am not sure whether or not you have taken a position on this matter, but my letter is to ask you to give support to the administration's decision to withdraw U.S. support from the Kyoto Protocol to help protect the country's citizens, including those who are retired and on fixed incomes. We already have an energy mess that is crippling the economy in California. Enacting the Kyoto Protocol would have put the whole country in danger of a California-style crisis."

He goes on and discusses that there is not agreement in this country. And that is true.

Another gentleman I know quite well, Mr. Sam Smith, the Whip of the House in Pennsylvania government, wrote me another letter: "The Kyoto Treaty would devastate mining communities unnecessarily because it really attacks the use of coal."

I am here to say that if we are going to deal with the energy crisis in this country, and we own 40 percent of the world's coal and 2 percent of the world's oil, clean coal technology needs to be a very strong part of our future energy policy.

It says here, "Mr. Bush got a lot of flack recently for opting to pull out of the Kyoto Treaty, but it was the correct decision and he did it for some very good reasons. Tens of thousands of those good reasons work in American coal fields and in our factories every day. The harsh realities of the treaty drawn up by international bureaucrats in Japan in 1987 would have its most devastating impact on small towns in States like Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Kentucky."

And it goes on here to talk about many of the things that have already been spoken about, that countries like China and our competitors, who have already stolen a lot of our light manufacturing, would force us to give them our heavy manufacturing, because that would be the only place in the world you could do it.

Let me come back to another issue that has been talked about a lot, the scare tactics of the ice melting and the oceans rising. Here is what it says. "As many know, the United Nation's Panel on Climate Change publishes a report on global climate change every 5 years. Chapter 11 of the most recent report addresses sea level rise, a favorite scare scenario of the media and radical climate warmers. Professor Morner is president of the International Commission representing the scientific community of sea level researchers. These are the best scientists in the world on this subject. This is what he had to say about Chapter 11 and the dire predictions made about catastrophic sea level rise:

"The IPCC Chapter 11 is a very inferior product, written by 33 persons in no way being specialists on the task. The real sea level specialists would never give these statements, figures, and interpretations." He says, "I have finished a seven-page review report. It is most shocking reading. Lots of modeler wishes but very little hard facts based on real observational data by true sea level specialists. I allow myself a few quotations from the report. It seems that the authors involved in this chapter were chosen not because of their knowledge on this subject, but rather because they would say the climate model that had been predicted.

This chapter has a low and unacceptable standard. It should be completely rewritten by a totally new group of authors chosen among the group of true sea level specialists. My concluding position is to dismiss the entire group of persons responsible for this chapter, form a new group based on real sea level specialists, let this group work independently of a climate modeler."

So much of this global warming concept has been computer models, and we know what they can do with computer models.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania would yield, there is no question, and I totally agree the treaty lacks a firm scientific basis. And while there is no disagreement that carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases are in our atmosphere, before the industrial revolution they were there, they are there now, but scientists disagree about the extent of man-made gases and how much they contribute to global warming.

The amount of warming or if the planet is warming at all, and like the gentleman from Pennsylvania suggests, some scientists have even come to the conclusion that maybe we are in a cooling-off period.

I think nowhere is this more evident than in the divergence between atmospheric conditions, the data collected from satellites and weather balloons, and surface temperature data collected from ships which tell a different story. Highly accurate satellite measurements do not note any warming over the past 2 decades.

What we have in the red, for those individuals that can make out the small details, the red is the surface temperature. The blue is the satellite-measured temperatures, and lower are the balloon-measured temperatures. If you take the satellite along with the weather balloon temperatures, they are almost on an even keel, and they show no global warming. The only global warming that is portrayed is the surface temperatures, and they could be caused by a lot of changes, such as expanded populations in some of the areas.

In terms of the potential contributions of ocean, you see a big peak over here in 1998. That was actually credited to the impact of El Nino. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania is totally correct. These and other shortcomings make climate models unreliable tools for predicting future climate change and for making energy policy.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PETERSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is absolutely right. In debates I have had with people who believe opposite of I, I say give me data. Give me facts and true measurements, and they cannot. They keep using these models. We have cycles of weather, but if my memory was correct, there was not much talking about global warming when we had the coldest temperature months in a hundred years this past winter. Temperature hours, we had a cold year overall. But you do not hear people talking about that.

A year or so ago when we had unusually warm summers brought on by El Nino and other air currents, everything was global warming.

I think it is very important that we also mention about the sinks that were earlier discussed. A lot of our scientists are amazed when our air currents hit the ocean after crossing the eastern part of the country because from Michigan to Pennsylvania we have tremendous forests that are great sinks that suck up the carbon dioxide, and when the air currents reach the ocean, they have a lot less carbon dioxide than when they left because of the combination of farm country and our forests. This country may not be a contributor because of our sinks, as indicated on the charts that here.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me put that chart back up. Just to review, Europe and the North Africa area, the red indicates the amount of CO₂ that they are putting into the air. The blue at the bottom indicates how much they sequester or capture of CO₂. And of course all living organisms live on CO₂.

Our plants collect that as part of their growing.

Because our agriculture is so intense and expansive in the United States and our forest lands are so abundant, we capture about the same amount of CO₂ as we emit. Unlike the European countries, as you see on the right, the tropics and the southern hemisphere capture more because of the forests and the growth of biological products in that area. We see a great sequestering.

But the point needs to be made strongly that that has to be part of the consideration. And it has to be part of our research in the future. How do we increase our ability with technology to capture some of that CO₂ just in case it might be causing a greenhouse gas out there.

I am chairman of the Subcommittee on Research in the Committee on Science, and all of the scientists in the field on this issue agree that we need more research on global warming because there is so much that we do not know. We are basing so many conclusions on incomplete research. There is a lot of shooting from the hip. If we are going to make this dramatic change such as what is described in the Kyoto treaty, I think it behooves us to move ahead more aggressively with the same kind of scientific research and that is what we are going to do in the Committee on Science and that is what this administration has suggested.

Mr. PETERSON of Pennsylvania. The Kyoto treaty, that chart says it all about this country. If the Kyoto protocol was implemented, would it reduce global warming if it were a proven fact? The answer is "no" because it would only restrict emissions in our country. It has minimal impact in Europe and all of the developing countries that are stealing our manufacturing, like Mexico and China, who would not be living up to any agreement. They would be doing nothing.

So we would be pushing manufacturing out of a country that has the best pollution control equipment in the world, taking that manufacturing to parts of the world that have little or no control over emissions, and would actually be adding to air pollution in the world.

The Kyoto treaty was not written by a friend of the United States. It is probably one of the worst documents signed and brought back to this country because it would destroy our economic base. If global warming was a fact of life, it would do little or nothing.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I think it is fair to at least mention the tremendous political influence that some of the environmental community has. We all want a cleaner environment. We are all going to move ahead to develop renewable-type resources that can minimize the CO₂ emissions, but a tremendous political influence that I think has caused maybe some in the previous administration to agree to these kinds of protocols because it was so strongly supported by a strong political group.

I think the bottom line is that if we are going to make reasonable policy decisions, we are going to have to get emotion away from that policy table and scientific evidence on the table to make the kind of decisions that are going to have a tremendous impact on the economy of this and other countries.

Mr. PETERSON of Pennsylvania. One of the things that I have found distressing, the scientists that have had the courage to speak out on this issue have often been called to task by the college presidents by saying we want you to tone down your discussion of this issue. We are going to lose research dollars.

Mr. Speaker, that is not what science is about. Science should be seeking the truth and the facts. When you have a university president telling real scientists that they should not be talking about their findings in a real scientific way, you are cooking the books. In my view, a lot of that happened in the last few years. There was a huge influence from the White House and the Vice President's office, and there was intimidation at the university level that if you wanted grants and further studies, you better give them the message that they want.

When you buy scientific information and you tell them what you want to be in the answer, you are not getting anything for your money because all you are getting is somebody to state what you want stated.

Mr. Speaker, real science is about searching for the scientific facts. I think a lot of that was veered from in the last recent years.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There is no question that making sense of climate variability is a hugely complex challenge, but one that we can make progress on, at least before we commit to onerous regulations.

In a 1999 study, the National Research Council made recommendations for a research strategy focusing on unanswered scientific questions. The NRC identified over 200 questions that need answers if we are to understand and predict climate change. That is exactly what the gentleman from Pennsylvania is suggesting; we need real science and real answers to some of these questions.

But in the meantime, there are things that we can do to reduce greenhouse gas emissions. We can improve energy efficiency, and we are doing that. We are developing new energy sources, sources that do not emit CO₂; and certainly the research to expand the sequestration of CO₂ must be encouraged.

I have one chart that I think is dramatic. This is a model by the UC National Center for Atmospheric Research. What this diagram shows, the red line is what is going to happen to global warming without the Kyoto treaty. The orange line that we see coming up slightly underneath it in the years 2040 to 2050, represents the possible reduction in temperature. And even if all of the Kyoto treaty was implemented, the reduction in climate is 0.07 degrees centigrade, almost unmeasurable in its extent. We still have scientists that came before me in my pursuit of what is the right answer suggesting that a little global warming might be good for agricultural expansion in this country. So with that small a degree in warming, I think it is very important that the Members of this Chamber, Madam Speaker, understand that we could go into grave consequences by the implementation of this. That is why I certainly want to encourage the negotiators on the conference committee that are taking up this State Department authorization bill to review this.

I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PETERSON of Pennsylvania. Another factor, around 1440, there was 7 degrees of warming temperature. The negative impact was the agricultural belt in this country expanded immensely. They were growing grapes further north than ever grown before. The food basket grew. There was no measured real evil force from the temperature rising 7 degrees, which has not happened in recent centuries.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the historical consequences of such a modest warming, I mentioned have shown to be beneficial. An example I was looking at was during the Medieval climate optimum. During that optimum period of slightly warming temperatures from 800 to 1200 A.D., improved agricultural production linked to warmer weather led to economic expansion throughout Europe.

There are many things that we need to give priority to to get answers to the 200 questions that the scientific community have suggested that we need answers to before we proceed in this type of venture.

Mr. PETERSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I welcome scientific facts, not computer models, but the real facts. That is what we need to deal with. I think it is very important that we do get this language taken out. We have had enough promotion and sales pitch on global warming and the Kyoto protocol in the last 8 years. It is time to get back to sound science.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I put the last chart up to show some of the accomplishments that we have achieved in the last 35-40 years especially in terms of increased energy efficiency.

The top black line represents the energy use at constant 1972 GDP. How much GDP does one unit of energy achieve.

What has happened is our actual energy use to achieve this greater GDP, which has almost doubled since 1979, is way down below what we have expected. That shows this country has been very aggressive in trying to achieve the greater economy. It takes 30 percent less energy to produce a dollar of GDP than it did in 1970. So we are moving ahead.

That greater efficiency means less emissions. That greater efficiency means less energy use that is also compounding our problem right now.

It is an appropriate time to discuss this issue of the Kyoto protocol when we are looking at high energy prices because if we were to follow that protocol and reduce our energy use back to the 1979 levels, we would have to ration the amount of home heating fuel and gasoline and coal; and the way to ration it would be dramatically increasing price or some kind of law that says you can use only so much.

Either way, there is a dramatic implication on the economy of this country, and that means on the standard of living of this country, because what other companies are going to do if energy prices were to go up in the United States, they are going to look at these countries like China and Mexico and the other ones that were impacted by this protocol and look at the energy price there that is going to be much lower, and they will say, hey, we are going to move our business and our factories and our production to those other countries. Of course, when that happens and those other countries start developing, it is very unlikely that they are going to sign a similar protocol some time in the future to impede their economy. So I think it behooves us all to make sure that we think very carefully before we emotionally move ahead on something that might cause more damage than it does good.

Mr. PETERSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I think it is pretty outstanding when we have been increasing the efficiency of manufacturing and processing by more than a percent a year. The gentleman talked about 30 percent. I was reading something today that was 40 percent, I do not know what the time span was, but we have made tremendous progress in the efficient use of energy.

Now, it is my belief that the reason we are in an energy crunch today is number one, we did not have an energy policy and we had very cheap oil and very cheap gas for an extended period of time that kind of shifted us in the wrong direction. But, there was a real move in this country away from coal, away from nuclear, and the Kyoto protocol concept had us trying to phase out fossil fuels with a false assumption.

Now, we are all for renewables, but when we look at the charts, and I have read all the charts recently of energy usage in this country and growth, and when they are projecting into 2010 and 2020, renewables are still a very narrow line. I mean, there is not a lot of growth there whether it is solar or whether it is wind, and, of course, hydro has been stuck at the same amount. The chart showed, hydro, questionable in the ability to relicense; nuclear, questionable in the ability to relicense.

Those are discussions we are going to have to have. Because the phaseout of the use of fossil fuels, the phaseout of coal, except for power generation, has put a heavy load on other energies and has us in a position where we are very dependent on oil from foreign countries that are not our friends. I have a personal fear at the moment, and I heard on this floor just a couple of nights ago why we were even thinking of building coal power plants when we can build these clean natural gas ones. I believe personally we have overloaded natural gas.

I do not think we can drill wells fast enough, because what we are going to do is we are going to endanger home heating costs. We are going to have people who now mostly depend on gas for their home heating; most of our factories, our schools, our hospitals use gas. We are going to have a huge shortfall of gas in this country.

Gas prices doubled last winter. I am afraid they could double again this winter. If that is the case, we are going to have people unable to pay their energy bills, seniors unable to stay warm. When we talk about a ripple effect in our economy, natural gas will make one far worse than gasoline, because when we drive, we can drive the vehicle that gets the best mileage, we can drive a little less, give up the pleasure trips. But when it comes to heating a home and running a business, there are not too many options.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman opened the door to a short discussion as we conclude on energy. Let me briefly go through a couple of the charts that I think describe the predicament that we are facing in energy.

This chart simply shows the top red line is energy consumption, and the bottom green line is energy production at the 1990-2000 growth rates, and so the middle is the projected shortfall. That means we are becoming more and more dependent, like the gentleman said, on other countries, especially OPEC countries.

In 1970, I was asked to go on the Presidential Oil Policy Commission, and so we went over to the White House with Bill Simon every morning at 6:30 to find out where the available supplies were and how we could distribute them. At that time we were very nervous because we were in a Cold War situation, so we gave agriculture a top priority for fuel.

So two decisions were made. Number one, put a price ceiling on the price that could be charged for gas and petroleum products. Number two, give agriculture a top priority. I was assigned the task of sort of substituting for the market economy in trying to find out what farmers were low on fuel.

So we set up a computer in every county of the United States, every agricultural county of the United States, and they would call in if they were out of fuel and we would go down to the chart and say, look, under law, you are required to deliver to this area so this farmer can have fuel. We learned then that price controls, from the long gas lines to the fact that we were doing a very poor job in allocating this scarce resource; computers were not good enough then, they are not good enough now, so rationing is a predicament, but this chart shows the increased dependency, and most of this is on the OPEC countries, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania suggested, that we need to not only expand, reduce our dependency totally, but certainly we need to look at some of those other countries, the Caspian area countries and others that might have a better attitude towards the United States.

This chart shows an average of what goes into a gallon of gasoline. So the crude oil price, which is what has usually been the basis, 58 cents of the price of $1.81 which was May 1, I think; 18 cents Federal tax, State tax is 27 cents, refining costs, 58 cents; distributing and marketing costs, 20 cents. Gasoline has gone up.

Mr. Speaker, I introduced a bill to suggest that the Department of Energy review all the regulations, especially the boutique fuel regulations. This chart shows the 15 different boutique fuel regulations in different parts of the United States, and if we multiply that by 3 for the regular, the midgrade and the premium, one can understand, with all of those different fuels, the tremendous inefficiency that is required by complying with those kinds of regulations. So we have to have separate holding tanks, separate pipelines, or we have to clean out our pipelines before we ship another variety through, so we need to review those. This is old data. We need to make sure that we can protect the environment, but review these kinds of regulations to see what the new technology can contribute.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PETERSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I think we will find where we see those bright colors where the prices have been in the last year or two where we had spikes in the central part of the country; the year before in California; two years ago was up the East Coast where truck fuel prices were exorbitantly high. But where these special fuels are, our national system of pipelines does not work, because we have a different type of fuel than most of the country is using, and if one of our refineries goes down, then there is just not enough to go around, and so the price is going to go up for that marketplace. So this has really complicated the gasoline and truck fuel delivery system.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, this chart shows, I think, something that we can be very proud of. The increase in gross domestic product in this country has been plus 147 percent, where U.S. coal consumption has increased 100 percent, but U.S. energy consumption in total has only gone up 42 percent, and the key air emissions have actually gone down 31 percent.

Mr. Speaker, the United States is leading the world in terms of pushing the kind of research that is going to reduce CO₂ emissions, but whether it is CO₂ or whether it is vapor emissions going into those greenhouse gases, or whether it is the kind of new technology where we can develop new energy sources, the United States is moving ahead probably more aggressively than any other country, and we need to do that, but we do not need to sign and agree to the Kyoto protocol, which is not based on complete science and which would be a punishment to the United States.

Mr. PETERSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I think the head of our energy policy, as Mr. Bush and Mr. CHENEY have shared with us, is we have to conserve, we have to use energy efficiently and be more cautious that we are not wasting energy. I think we still have lots of progress we can make there. And we must continue to do that. But that is down to every American citizen who can contribute there. It does not need to be some new law, it does not need to be some strict regulation, but I think leadership from the White House is going to help Americans be much more conscious.

Of course, prices makes us much more conscious. As prices go up, we are going to turn lights out when we are not using them. We are not going to turn our thermostats to be quite as high. We will not drive quite as fast and waste fuel. We might take a little shorter trip. We may look at the next car we buy to be more fuel efficient. Those are all things we can do individually, but they should be personal choices. They should be incentives, not strict government rules and not a heavy hand from government. The American people all need to realize that we are all in this together.

However, on top of that, we cannot conserve our way out of this crisis. We have been phasing out production, and $10 oil certainly killed production in this country and $1 gas stopped all drilling. There are a lot of people thinking there are just thousands of wells out there capped, ready to let gas out. That is not true today. The pipeline system is inadequate to get the gas from one part of the country to the other. The grid that moves electricity is inadequate to get where there is excess electricity to parts of the country where there is a shortage. We need an investment in our total system. But when we have all energies in a greater amount available in inventory, that is what stabilizes prices.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And the market system works. I think we have a responsibility at the Federal level to make sure as best we can that there is competition, and there is not the kind of gouging. But if last year, the crude oil prices got for a little while over $30 a barrel, I think now they are around $26, but still if we were to say, you cannot sell crude oil for over the $8 a barrel that was a low point several years ago, I mean there would not be exploration. They would not be coming into Pennsylvania and Michigan doing some wildcatting. They would not be acidizing some of the old wells to drain them dry of oil, and there would not be the kind of research that can make sure that we can be environmentally friendly in the smaller drilling in the fact that we can now sit on one site and go for 4 miles in all directions to capture some of the oil down below, rather than having the congestion that we saw back in the 1940s and 1950s maybe in Oklahoma and Texas. So technology is a huge change.

Mr. PETERSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, we helped fund research that they felt very close to working using ultrasound, one type of ultrasound to clean out the old well bore, the other kind to go out and loosen the oil from the rock crevices and let it flow into the well. They have successfully increased production with ultrasound. Now it is a matter of the next study is going to put it out into the field in a number of wells, and if that works, we will be able to get more oil. But those are the sorts of things we need to do.

I was at Penn State recently. They have a project there that has been completed in the laboratory, and now it is moving into the refinery where they are going to take western Pennsylvania coal and make jet fuel and have a carbon product that will be used by Pennsylvania's famous carbon industry. So they will take coal and turn it into two carbon items. One is jet fuel and the other one a carbon product that will be used in manufacturing, and they also have a fluidized bed boiler that can be implemented and could be used by hospitals, could be used by schools, could be used by factories, that can burn any fuel. Because the fluidized bed process is what we are using in this country to burn our high sulfur waste coal, in Pennsylvania we are using it, because they use a crushed limestone slurry that takes the sulfur and unites with it instead of sending it up to stack into the air and helps it burn it cleanly, and they are claiming that if it can burn coal and wood waste, it could burn coal and animal waste, it could burn coal and animal fat, it could burn natural gas, it could burn number 10 oil or fuel oil.

This kind of burner would then give a manufacturing plant or a university the ability to buy the cheapest energy that year.

When we get that kind of competition going out there we will not be stuck, because this winter we are going to have businesses and people owning homes stuck on high-priced natural gas because this country moved strictly to making all the new power plants gas without adequate inventory to back it up, in my view.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think it is worth mentioning that over the last 8 years, we have been so conscientious or the administration was so conscientious on the environment that we ended up closing down about one-third of our refineries in this country with regulations and increased costs. We ended up stopping a lot of the clean coal mining in this country.

Right now I think the estimate is something around 250 to 300 years' worth of energy from coal, if we move ahead on that kind of technology. Or if we use some of technology that we have now, the administration and President Bush is suggesting another $2 billion over the next 10 years to do research on clean coal technology to even do a much better job of the nitrates and sulfur dioxide emission, besides the particle pollution that is happening.

We are able to do a lot of that now. With a little more effort, we can make this kind of a fuel a very efficient contribution to a continuing strong economy in this country.

Mr. PETERSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I asked the question recently on why the question mark on relicensing hydro. Someone said, remember, these hydro plants, where water runs through a pipe coming out of a dam and turns a turbine, there is no environmental downside, these dams were built without adequate environmental impact statements, and we might want to have to tear them down.

That is where we are coming from on this whole issue. That is at a time when we are looking at shortages.

There are some very new interesting pebble bed nuclear plants that are built in small units that can be built right alongside of existing plants that have very little fuel waste and solve a lot of problems. They are being built all over the world.

Our whole energy issue, if we want to become more self-sufficient and not dependent, the thing we must not forget, the Far East countries that are providing so much of our oil today, and that is just one of our energy sources, they could double the prices again tomorrow by just restricting how much they will give us. They set the price. They have the ability, because of the amount we are buying from them, they can set the price.

If we can lower that, that is why some of us are even supporting ANWR drilling, because we need to do anything we can do to take away that control that these countries that are unfriendly to us have over us, because they could cause us to have $40 oil in the next month.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman talks about the national security of this country, of our country. Certainly there is power that a few countries in the world now have over our ability to produce.

And look, we have changed. We are a new world. We are not where we were back in the thirties. We now have high-rise office buildings where we need the elevator to get up to that 15th or 20th floor; where the windows do not open, so we need the air conditioning in hot weather and we need some warming up in cold weather. We are a new society.

We have got so many older individuals that are on the kind of life support system where it is actually a matter of life and death. We cannot be a government that accepts brownouts, certainly not blackouts, as a regular order of business.

That means moving ahead aggressively with conservation, but conservation cannot do it all. It means expanding, and I am biased as chairman of the Subcommittee on Research, but it means dramatically expanding our research efforts.

Mr. PETERSON of Pennsylvania. I just talked to my local school district, who paid $2.80 for gas last year. They have now purchased this winter's gas for $5.40. Last year they paid as high as $12 one month because they had not purchased ahead.

When people this winter start paying $10 per thousand for gas, they may think, is it smart to lock up the whole West Coast for gas drilling? Is it smart to lock up the whole East Coast for gas drilling? Is it smart to lock up all of our shoreline except Texas and Louisiana? Those are the only two places I believe they are allowing drilling to happen. Is the environment compromised there? I do not think so.

We have the technology to get gas out of the ground today in a very environmental-friendly way. In a country like Norway, they drill all the way around themselves. They do not have their coastlines ruined. They have not ruined their environment. But natural gas is what they use, and I am told they have the model system of drilling offshore.

We are going to have to look at all of those things. Prices will force people to take a broader look at this issue, because $10 gas will be painful when we are heating our homes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As we conclude this special order session, certainly I would like to thank the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BARTON) and the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. PETERSON).

If the gentleman from Pennsylvania would like to give a wrap-up conclusion.

Mr. PETERSON of Pennsylvania. I just say to the American public, to Members, and to those listening, I just believe that we need to support the President's comprehensive energy plan. There is no quick fix to our energy needs.

As we talked, I think a lot of it has been brought up by the hysteria of the Kyoto Protocol and the concept that the Kyoto was something special that we had to do. If global warming was a fact of life, the Kyoto Protocol was not something that made it better. It was a bad deal for this country, and would not have changed what the situation was in the world, because it would have allowed all the countries to steal our employment, steal our factories, where they do not have strict pollution laws.

In this country, where we have the strictest and the best technology, we would have lost the business, so it would not have improved the world's atmosphere, it would have destroyed the economic base. The poor people in America would have lost their jobs.

That, and the energy issue as a whole is one that the American people had better be very wise about. I think the Bush-Cheney administration on the Kyoto Protocol made the right decision, and having a broad-based energy where we improve our ability to have the energy we need for this country, and allow the marketplace then to work from supply, not from shortages, is what is needed.

I thank the gentleman tonight for allowing me to join in on his special hour.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania. In the authorizing bill for the State Department that went through the Committee on International Relations, there was an amendment in there, and that is what we have been talking about tonight, to go ahead with implementation of the Kyoto Protocol.

It is interesting, that vote was very close. I think it was 20 to 22 that the amendment succeeded in going on that bill with something like 14 members absent, so it is a real question that needs debate.

I would certainly encourage the conferees from the House and Senate, when they meet to reconcile the differences between the House and Senate, that they seriously look at the consequences of that language and consider removing it from the final bill.

THE ENERGY CRISIS IN CALIFORNIA AND THE WEST

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GRUCCI). Under the Speaker's announced policy of January 3, 2001, the gentleman from California (Mr. FILNER) is recognized for 60 minutes as the designee of the minority leader.

Mr. FILNER. Mr. Speaker, we are going to spend the next hour or so speaking about the crisis in California and the West, and spreading to other parts of this country.

Apparently, this Congress is going to adjourn tomorrow or the next day passing a tax cut for the wealthiest of Americans but refusing, refusing to do anything about the electricity crisis in California.

We just heard how good the President's energy plan was. Yet, out of the 105 recommendations made by the President in his energy plan, not one, not one addresses the problems of California and the West.

Those problems are severe. California's economy is teetering on the edge. If California's economy goes, so goes the rest of the Nation.

What is the source of the problem in California and the West, and what actions should we take to solve it? That is what we want to spend some time tonight in dealing with, and we have colleagues who will testify that this issue is not just confined to California but to other parts of the West, the Midwest, and the eastern parts of our Nation.

The roots of this crisis go back to last summer. California passed a deregulation law a couple of years ago. It put the path to deregulation that our utilities in the State would have to go. San Diego, California, which I represent, was the very first by the terms of the deregulation act to fully deregulate its wholesale and retail prices.

I think San Diego was the first place in the Nation, certainly in the State of California, to fully deregulate in this way. We found out in retrospect that that deregulation law was badly flawed. It allowed deregulation of a basic commodity, the oxygen of our economy, when there was no market, no competitive market, to allow the reduction of rates that were promised by the law. Yet, we went ahead and deregulated, and boy, did we find out what a mistake it was.

When my constituents in San Diego opened their bills last June, they were completely shocked to see that their prices had literally doubled. Even worse, the next month the prices had gone up another level, tripled from the original pre-deregulation rate.

Now, if one was a senior on a fixed income paying $50 a month and the bill went to $150 or $200 without any explanation, without any reason, and without any end in sight for the increases, that person was panicky, wondering how they can air condition their apartment or heat it when necessary.

If one was a small business and paying $800 a month for electricity and the bill went to $1,500 and then to $2,500, even $3,000, how could that business stay in business? How could they survive with those rates? Scores of my constituents had to close their doors in that first just 60 days of deregulation in San Diego.

Now, San Diegans found out and learned pretty quickly what the reason was that this occurred. It was not any hotter a summer in 2000 than it was in 1999. Demand did not go up in California or in San Diego. The cost of producing a kilowatt of electricity, which is a couple of cents, did not increase.

Yet, their prices tripled in 60 days. It was clear that there was a manipulation of the market; that the few companies who controlled electricity in California were jacking up the prices, gouging people, and taking enormous, enormous profits. Those profits, Mr. Speaker, have amounted to $20 billion over the last year in California.

Now, all the politicians reacted to the panic, to constituents who came in and said they were going bankrupt. We looked death in the eye literally in San Diego last summer. We said that this price increase, these price increases, were caused by manipulation of the market by a whole number of means which we became aware of and submitted to the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, FERC.

FERC investigated what we had supplied them and they reported last November that, yes, we were right, the price was manipulated, the market was manipulated in San Diego, California, and the prices were unjust and unreasonable. That is the term in the law. Therefore, they were illegal.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the true crisis in California started the day that that report was issued by FERC, when they admitted or they revealed that the prices were illegal, yet they did nothing to stop the wholesalers and generators who were charging these prices.

What FERC said by not applying any sanctions to these wholesalers was "Go and rob the State blind, because we are not going to do anything about it." Boy, did they ever.

My friend, the gentleman from Sherman Oaks, California, the most well-known city in America, is here with me. We have representatives from Chicago and the Midwest. I hope the gentleman from California (Mr. SHERMAN) will pick up the story of what occurred when they said, "Go rob the State blind" to the energy wholesalers, and what they did to the State of California in the year 2001.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from San Diego, California (Mr. FILNER) whose home county was ground zero for the consumer being directly affected by this Statewide and now nationwide rip-off.

In 1999, California paid $7 billion for electricity generation. The next year, in the year 2000, we actually used less electricity at peak times, but for the same basic amount of electricity we paid $32½ billion. This year we will use the same amount of electricity as we used in the prior 2 years, and we will be charged $70 billion, from $7 billion to $70 billion, no more electrons, just more price. A transfer this year, if it continues, of $63 billion from the consumers of California to a few megacorporations coincidentally based in Texas.

The entire State said okay, we did not do the right thing with our deregulation. We want to reverse it. We want to regulate these same plants that used to be owned by our regulated local utilities and have been sold off to these big outfits based in Texas, and then we are told by the Federal Government, you cannot regulate these same plants that you regulated before, Federal law prevents it and we, the Federal Government, although the statute tells FERC that they are required, are required to insist upon fair and reasonable rates, they have decided to go AWOL.

So the effect is to move $63 billion of wealth from consumers in California to megacorporations chiefly in Texas. Now, in order to justify or hide this incredible rip-off, what we are told by many of our Republican colleagues is that this is not a rip-off. It is a morality play. California is immoral and should be punished by a just God who should transfer money to their political supporters.

Keep in mind, first, even if California made some mistakes in its environmental policy or its regulatory policies, it is hardly any reason for the Federal Government to tie our hands and prevent reasonable regulation, but it is also not true. California did not prevent the construction of these power plants.

First of all, in 1999, we were exporters of electricity many months during the year, exported it to the Pacific Northwest to other States, no one really wanted to build power plants in California. Nobody filed a serious application.

In fact, the private sector was able to buy the existing plants at bargain prices. They had no particular interest in building more, but let us say they have such an interest and let us say environmentalists somehow prevented them from building in California, two great leaps of imagination, physicists have informed me that electrons do not know when they cross a State border.

We have one electric grid for the West. You can build a plant in Arizona, Nevada, Oregon and Washington and save the same market. If you are interested in selling electricity in the West, it does not matter which side of the State boundary you are.

They were not building plants in Nevada, and they were not building plants in Arizona until a year ago. We had a Republican governor in California who in his 8-year term did not grant a single permit, because none was seriously requested. Now we have 14 plants under construction.

The City of Los Angeles has no shortage because we have public power. We are exporting power from the City of Los Angeles to the other parts of the West.

The reason we have this shortage is because a few megacorporations have discovered a new definition for "closed for maintenance"; that is to say, the plant is closed to maintain an outrageous price for each kilowatt. That is what is happening.

Mr. FILNER. Mr. Speaker, I want to continue with the California story and what our recommendations are to solving it, but I want our colleagues to know that this is not just a California problem. This is not just a western problem. This is a national problem. That is why only the Federal Government can step in.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Chicago, Illinois (Mr. RUSH) would like to tell us what is happening in his home State and home city in Chicago.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. RUSH)

Mr. RUSH. First of all, I want to thank the gentleman from California (Mr. FILNER) for not only his convening this special order for this evening, but for all the outstanding work that he has done on the issue of energy prices throughout America.

I certainly want to thank the gentleman from California (Mr. FILNER) and the gentleman from California (Mr. SHERMAN) for their outstanding contributions.

Tonight, I just want to rise to discuss the endless stream of energy problems suffered by consumers within the City of Chicago. This is indeed not just a California problem. It is not just an Illinois problem.

It is a problem that America faces, but in order to paint a picture of what is happening in Illinois, I want to zoom in on Chicago. In the summer of 1999, Chicago experienced almost daily electricity blackouts; the following summer, the summer of the year 2000, Chicago consumers were subject to gasoline prices which soared above national averages.

Then during the winter of 2000, Chicagoans faced 300 percent to 400 percent increases in their gas bills over the previous winters.

As if that stream of emergencies was not enough, today this very day while thousands of Chicago residents are digging their way out of the winter national gas debts, they have been slammed by yet another seasonal energy crisis.

With an average regional price of $1.80 per gallon of gasoline in the Midwest, Chicagoans have been paying up to an astonishing $2.40 per gallon for gasoline which represents the most dramatic increases in gasoline prices within this entire Nation.

If we would just consider the following: taking a snapshot of 10 major metropolitan areas nationwide during the month of April, Chicago's spike, and that is indicated by the bar in red, Chicago's spike in gasoline prices dwarfs the cities on this chart and all cities nationwide.

The chart says that the average gasoline price increase was 12.8 percent average across the Nation; but in Chicago, it was in excess of 22 percent. Simply put, these recent and drastic price increases are more than my constituents can bear.

For example, there exists in my district a man who owns a grocery store who delivers foods and goods to the people in the neighborhood. Because of the recent hikes in gasoline prices, this man, this breadwinner for his family, this business owner is forced to factor the increased costs of gasoline into his delivery charges. And as a result, many of the elderly customers who live on fixed income must bear the weight of the current crisis.

These are people who have no other means of income, except what they get from their fixed income checks, their Social Security and other types of fixed income checks on a monthly basis.

Indeed, the effects of extreme gasoline prices does not only affect individuals, but entire bodies of local governments. For example, last summer, I convened a Chicago delegation hearing on that summer's exorbitant gasoline prices. And at the hearing, we heard from a gentleman from the district of my colleague from Illinois (Mr. DAVIS), who you will hear from later. We heard from Chief Gregory Moore of the Village of Bellwood Police Department in suburban Chicago.

During the hearing, Mr. Moore testified to the fact that the costs of operating police vehicles jeopardized the solvency of the police department's budget. That was just one indication of the impact on local governments. The list of the local impacts goes on and on and on.

What adds insult to injury in the current situation is the fact that while consumers nationwide struggle with gasoline and other energy prices, the big oil and gas companies are realizing greater and greater profits.

For example, in the summer of 1999, the average spread between the spot price of crude oil and gasoline was 8 cents per barrel. During the following summer, that spread rose to 15 cents per barrel. Shockingly during the month of April 2001, we saw that spread hit an all-time high of 34 cents per barrel.

What this dramatic increase means is that despite relative stability and refining costs, the profit margin for refiners has skyrocketed. This is only one example of how big energy continues to profit while consumers continue to pay unreasonable high prices.

Many industry experts and insiders, including President Bush and Vice President CHENEY argued that the recent windfalls in big energy profits is simply a result of national market reactions to constrained supply and energy across the board. But when gasoline companies in the Midwest and natural gas companies in the West walk the fine legal line and intentionally reduce the output, market forces are not at work, Mr. President. When unchecked merchant mania strangles competition in the petroleum industry, I would argue that market forces are not at work, Mr. President, and Mr. Vice President. When Midwestern petroleum refiners maliciously failed to make the investment in refineries in an effort to turn the public against locally produced clean burning fuel additives, market forces are certainly not at work, Mr. President and Mr. Vice President.

What makes matters worse is that in this feverish desire to pump up the free market, the President and the Vice President have forgotten about the very people that the market is supposed to benefit, the little people. And this fact was made perfectly clear in the nomination of Timothy J. Muris to the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. Muris is a man who has been excessively critical of the very purpose, the mission, the object of that body, the Federal Trade Commission, which is singly to investigate unfair and deceptive corporate practices. Well, this certainly reminds me of the proverbial fox guarding the hen house.

Clearly, the President's National Energy Policy, which I quote, is "designed to help bring together business, government, local communities and citizens", is really designed to bring the big energy barons closer to the pockets of our beleaguered citizenry.

So in response to the administration's energy plans which sets a series of long-term goals for "strengthening the market", I challenge the President to remember that his constituency extends beyond big business. I also challenge the President to talk to the needy, the informed, the struggling, and the elderly about where our energy prices will be in 10 years. I challenge the President to tell the leaders of local government, municipalities who are on the verge of budget crisis that they will have to ride out volatile markets for the next 10 years.

So in closing, let me say that, as long as energy markets in this country remain unpredictable, consumers will be forced to suffer unexpected and undue hardship. We in Congress, and those in the White House, must find some way to level the playing field so that consumers are not forced to pay for the necessity of energy as though it was a luxury.

Unfortunately, the President's vague, uninspired and one-dimensional energy plan with its blind faith in the market shows that the administration has turned a blind eye to the current needs of the American people, to the right-now needs of the American consumer.

I want to thank again the gentleman from California (Mr. FILNER) for this opportunity, and I want to commend him again and exalt him and lift him up, because he has done such a magnificent job on this issue and other issues as we attempt to try to correct an insane, incentive, callous energy plan that the White House has come up with.

Mr. FILNER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. RUSH) for telling us what is going on in Chicago. It sounds like Chicagoans have learned the same lesson as San Diegans.

This is not a crisis of supply and demand. This is not a crisis of environmental regulation or overregulation. This is a manipulation of the market by incredibly big firms and just a few of them who, whether it is gasoline or natural gas or electricity, have earned record, record profits from 500 percent to 1,000 percent per quarter higher than the previous quarter, while our people on fixed income, our small businesses, our big businesses are suffering, and the profits flow at the expense of our people.

Mr. Speaker, the best metaphor I have heard on this issue was from a Republican colleague in California who had said what is happening here is as if you were scheduled for a life-and-death operation in a hospital at 3 p.m., and you were getting prepared for that operation, and at 5 to 3:00, the administrator to the hospital comes in and says now how much were you willing to pay for that oxygen."

This is not a question of lack of supply. This is not a question of cost of production. This is a question of control of a basic commodity at the very moment that it is needed. If one is not moral and if one is interested only in gouging and if one does not care about the people involved, one can charge whatever the market will bear.

We have also learned that the President's policy does nothing to help the situation.

So I thank the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. RUSH) for helping us here understand the issue. We are learning that the high prices are not the result of any market supply and demand curve. We are learning from the profit reports how much these multinational corporations are making.

Now, the issue becomes what are we as a society, what are we as a Congress going to do about it. The President has not given us an answer. The President has what I call a faith-based energy policy. He is praying to the markets. But I say to the President, there is no market here. There is no competition. There is withholding of supply. There is manipulation of statistics. There is gaming the system, and we are suffering.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DAVIS), another Member from the Chicago area who is with us to tell us about what is going on in the Midwest.

Mr. DAVIS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from California (Mr. FILNER) for yielding to me. I am pleased to join with him and the gentleman from California (Mr. SHERMAN), the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. RUSH), and large numbers of other people throughout the country who recognize that America, the world's most powerful economic engine, is suffering from a severe energy crisis. That means big trouble, big trouble for the American economy, but also big trouble for the world economy.

When the energy supply of an engine suddenly becomes erratic, unstable or insufficient, one can expect that the impact will be felt and felt soon. Well, the impact of our energy crisis is being felt from California to Illinois. America's families and America's small businesses all over the country are facing energy shutdowns and back-breaking prices for gasoline, natural goods, and electricity.

Suddenly, even middle-class families are facing the choice between paying their energy bills or paying their mortgages or car payments. Suddenly small businesses are being forced to cut back or, in some cases, even close. At the same time when most American corporations are reporting reduced earnings, energy companies are reporting record profits.

I remember Shakespeare saying one time that there was something rotten here, and I suspect that it is. Americans want to know what is going on, who is to blame. They deserve an answer, an honest answer.

What do we do? We know that California, for instance, has enough electrical generation capacity to meet their needs but that, under deregulation, power producers have strong incentives not to run plants at full capacity or even to shut them down to manipulate prices.

We know that, despite allegations of the difficulty in getting environmental permits to build new plants in California, nine major new power projects have been approved in the last 2 years, six of which are under construction.

We know that much of the high cost of gasoline in the Midwest and Illinois in particular has been attributed to the cost of additives for the summer reformulation of gas. Of course we know that we do not use those additives in Chicago. We use ethanol in plentiful and cheap supply even as gas prices jolted to well over $2 per gallon and remain there at most stations.

We know that more drilling for oil has been touted as a major fix for our energy crisis even though we have enough gasoline for the summer driving season. Even though California uses no oil to produce electricity and even though the drillers have targeted one of our national treasurers for drilling, the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. We know that America, which ruthlessly demands productivity from its workers, which justifies the mass layoffs of workers in the name of productivity, squanders its energy and powers pollutants, greenhouse gases, acids and particulates in the air and water.

We also know that the administration has proposed reducing spending on energy efficiency and renewable energy by 15 percent and appears ready to repeal energy efficiency standards implemented in the 106th Congress. Those regulations, which would increase the efficiency of new washers and air conditioners, can meet 5 percent of our energy needs by 2020. That translates into about 60 fewer power plants than we would otherwise need.

By the way, these more efficient appliances would also save their owners money for the life of the appliance. We know that, according to Public Citizen, that nine power companies and a trade association that stand to gain most from Federal energy policy decisions affecting California contributed more than $4 million to one party alone. Three of those companies gave $1.5 million.

So it has become something of a mantra among those here in Washington not to try and solve problems by simply throwing money at them. So I am amazed that here we are with a raging fire consuming our Nation with the inability of people to get the basic energy that they need. There is no real plan coming from our administration.

I say, and we say, that something must be done and it must be done now. And that is why I am pleased to be associated with individuals who are willing to act, who understand that inaction is not the way to solve problems, who recognize that we cannot stick our heads in the sand like an ostrich but who know that the American people are waiting, looking, seeking, and expecting that their government will act.

If deregulation has been the answer, it must have been an answer that I have not seen, or it must have been an answer that millions of other consumers have not seen. And so I think it is time to step in to act, and I thank the gentleman from California (Mr. FILNER) for acting this evening by organizing this opportunity for all of us to discuss this tremendous issue, and I yield back to the gentleman.

Mr. FILNER. I thank the gentleman from Illinois. I, like you, find it just inexplicable that we are going to be leaving for our Memorial Day recess and this majority refuses to act on this crisis.

Mr. DAVIS of Illinois. It is incredible, it is unbelievable, and I do not know how we can have a good holiday knowing that whatever it is that we are about to use just might not work.

Mr. FILNER. I thank the gentleman, and we appreciate hearing from the Midwest.

Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the gentleman from California (Mr. SHERMAN), and I, are going to try to discuss in the time that we have left the short-term and long-term solutions to this problem.

It is clear that the prices are bleeding us dry in California; my colleague from California told us in 2 years from $7 billion to $70 billion. The short-term answer involves getting down those prices. The long-term answer, and we will discuss what the Governor of California is doing and what the President of the United States is not doing, is to make sure that we diversify our resources of energy, get into alternative and renewable sources, and begin the discussion of public power, which, as the gentleman knows, Los Angeles is very familiar with, and have so avoided our problems in the rest of the State.

The prices have driven us to near bankruptcy in the State. Our major utilities are bankrupt. Sixty-five percent of the small businesses in San Diego County face bankruptcy this year. What should we do about these prices?

Mr. SHERMAN. The answer is simple and long in coming. The answer is established by Federal law and ignored by a Federal regulatory agency. Our law says that the price being charged by wholesale generators, those who bought the plants from our local utilities and are operating them, chiefly big companies based in Texas, that they should only charge fair and reasonable rates. And the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, FERC, is there to make sure that they only charge reasonable rates. Well, California has been FERC'd.

The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission refuses to do its job. So we here in Congress need to force them to do their job. Alternatively, it would be just as good if we simply allowed California to do the job. It really is a multi-state market, but most of the plants that supply California are in California. Some might say, well, why can California not solve the problem by imposing fair, regulated price on these plants located in our State? The power of the Federal Government through preemption stands on our neck and watches our pockets being picked.

Mr. FILNER. It is amazing that an administration which stresses States' rights and wants to keep the government off our backs will not allow us to do that.

It costs 2 or 3 cents a kilowatt to produce electricity. We are paying in California anywhere from 30 cents to 50 cents to $1. It went up to $2 last week. Could go to $5, who knows. The cost of production has no relationship to what they are charging us nor to the amount of electricity available.

And the same for natural gas, by the way. Turns out that the El Paso Gas Company, which controls the pipeline into California, kept the pipeline empty to drive up the prices. So the guys who charge us for electricity say, we have to charge you more for electricity, the price of natural gas went up. Well, the price of natural gas went up because the cartel, which is a subsidiary of the same electric companies that are saying they have to pay this, shot up the prices arbitrarily also. It is the prices, stupid, to coin a phrase.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have an adequate supply of pipeline space into California. It would be good to have some more. But the supply of pipeline capacity to move the natural gas from Texas and Colorado into California is just tight enough, not so that there is a shortage, but tight enough so that you can create a shortage. And as the gentleman pointed out, that is exactly what several of these companies, based in Texas, close friends just down the street at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, that is what these companies have done.

That is why the cost of moving natural gas from Texas to California has gone up by 1,200 percent for the same pipelines. No new pipelines have been built. No new investment. Just a 1,200 percent increase in the price. And that is why it costs more to move a unit of natural gas from Texas to California than the value of the natural gas. So Californians are paying for this natural gas, which has gone up nationwide; and then we are paying to move the natural gas in an amount in excess of the value of that increased price that the rest of the country is paying for natural gas. And then that then flows in.

So these independent electric utilities are in an interesting circumstance. If they want to generate electricity, they have to pay for the natural gas to generate it. If they operate all out, they will produce enough electricity so they will have to sell it for a reasonable profit. But if they restrict production, they need less natural gas to produce less electricity which they can sell for a lot more money. Withholding supply.

Mr. FILNER. This is the irony of the situation and the answer to our critics when we say we need what is called cost-based rates, established by the Federal Government, to get these prices under control. Cost-based rates means the generator of electricity can get the cost of production plus a reasonable profit. That is what it was under regulation, and it worked for 100 years. We want to return to that.

Interestingly enough, when there are no caps on the price, there is, as the gentleman has described, an incentive to withhold production.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, I should point out that that incentive exists only when things are close to shortage. There are States that have passed similar laws to California, but those are States that have been losing population, or at least losing relative population to the rest of the country. They are old and established States, the Internet has not touched them as much; and so those States have a significant oversupply, well over 15 percent oversupply of electric generating capacity.

It is not that this system can never work. It is just if you do it in a booming State, and California has been booming for a couple of years, you end up with a situation where you are close enough to shortage so they can smell the opportunity and get you.

Mr. FILNER. And they certainly took that opportunity.

So we need cost-based rates. We have legislation to do it. This Congress can take it up today, tomorrow, and pass it and bring some relief to people in California.

The Governor of California is doing everything he can to get out of the situation that the gentleman described, out of the tight supply situation. We have a dozen power plants online and getting into production. He is doing everything he can to encourage conservation with rebate programs and tax incentives to do this.

The governor of California, however, has no authority to regulate the wholesale price, only the Federal Government can do so.

So the Governor is working overtime. The legislature is working overtime, but they cannot bring down the prices because it is the Federal Government's responsibility. That is where we need to pass the legislation.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not the 14 plants that have just been approved, four or five of them are going to be on-line this summer, many more will be on-line by next summer. Californians are working overtime in conservation. We are second only to Rhode Island in using less electricity per person. When new statistics are available, I am sure we will be first. Even the President of the United States praised California's efforts at conservation. Although, frankly, it was kind of back-handed. He was not doing it to praise California, he was doing it to insult conservation, on the theory that anything being done in California was unworthy of being embraced as national policy.

We are doing all we can except for this huge blockage, and that is a Federal Government that will not let us regulate the price at the wholesale level, and will not regulate the price itself and huge transfers of wealth to a few big corporations.

Mr. FILNER. I have heard it said never has so much money been transferred from so many people to so few in so short a time. We are being killed by the prices. The Federal Government must act or the whole economy is threatened. It is these same corporations that control this that have prevented real research and development and implementation of alternative sources of energy because they cannot control those sources. It is decentralized and one that is out of their power.

So through photovoltaic and solar sales and wind power, we can in fact have energy sufficiency and independence without relying on these corporations; and we have to move in that direction. Yet this President not only does not do anything for California in his plan, but in his budget cuts research into alternative energy sources and cuts conservation programs.

What is he doing for us. I cannot figure out whether it is a political attack, one out of ignorance or just plain, hey, my friends in Texas are telling me what to do and I am just going to do it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I take up that issue about conservation research and renewables. The President's budget which then passed the floor of this House cut those areas by a third. We are in the middle of an energy crisis, but we cut our research on renewables conservation. It is absolutely absurd.

Then the President, realizing that the whole country wants research into renewables and conservation, issued this glossy report in which he says he is going to provide $2 billion in tax credits for clean coal, billions more for those who buy energy-efficient appliances. Billions and billions, except for one thing, he cut the money in the budget. So which is the law of the land, the budget we pass here? The glossy booklet that they put out of the White House press office; it is unfortunately, in this case, the law.

That is why the President needs a blackout because in the light of day it becomes apparent what he is advocating on the one hand out of the press office, which there is no money in the budget for, there will be no money appropriated for, it will never happen; but it will be talked about.

Mr. FILNER. There is a myth that our colleague, the gentleman from California, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means said earlier today in a debate, California inflicted this upon itself. Our environmental wackos overregulated and prevented plants from being built, and now we are suffering for it.

I want to talk about something that is going on in San Diego that will put a lie to that. I have a friend in San Diego who was a builder of power plants around the country. He is retired. He received environmental awards from all over the Nation for his ability to build power plants, but in both an architecturally and environmentally sensitive fashion.

He said last summer, I can build you a power plant, follow the environmental regulations, and it can be up and running in a fairly short amount of time. I can charge you what is called a cost-based rate which is roughly a nickel a kilowatt, and I will make money on it. I will make a profit, as I have always done. I will make sure that the people of San Diego have reasonably priced electricity. I will follow the environmental regulations.

We are in the process of trying to get that implemented. We are calling it the San Diego community power project. It puts a lie to this argument that California did this to itself because of environmental rules. We can respect the environment. We can have reasonably priced electricity if we have people like the builder of this plant, who understand that they can make money without gouging families and businesses in California.

Mr. SHERMAN. As I was talking about before, the private sector was not anxious to build plants in California. A few years ago they bought the existing plants at bargain prices, which is proof that there is no pent-up demand or desire to build plants. You can serve San Diego or Los Angeles with plants built in Nevada or Arizona or Oregon, and nobody was anxious to build plants in those States either, either to serve Las Vegas, a booming market, or California.

By the way, the electrons do not know when they pass a State boundary. The private sector did not want to build plants in the West. Now that we have these huge prices, a few companies are coming in to build, thank God.

If we have a moment, I would like to illustrate why it is that economics 101, which we are being fed by the White House office, is entirely wrong. If you only take one course in economics, you are told if you pay more for electricity, if you let the price go up and up, you will get more. Supply meeting demand. Then you have to take the advanced courses to learn what happens when somebody has monopoly power. If we had a regulated market, you could make the electricity, and you are talking about kilowatts, I will talk with megawatts, which are a thousand times as large. You make a megawatt for $30, sell it for $50, and you have no reason to withhold supply. Every megawatt you make, you make $20 on.

Mr. FILNER. And that is 66 percent profit.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a good profit. But if you have monopoly power and the White House is there to make sure that you do not get regulated, you produce less. Why produce a megawatt for $30 and sell it for $50 when by producing half as many, you can drive up the price to $500. You will sell fewer megawatts, but you will make an enormous profit on each one.

That is what is happening in California, and it is that simple to explain. With monopoly power, with the absence of regulation, with a White House that prevents us from proposing that regulation ourselves, with a White House commission that refuses to follow the law and impose that regulation, and with a House Republican leadership that refuses to tell the Federal Government to impose that regulation, the way you make the obscene profits is you produce a lot less electricity and you sell each megawatt for a fortune.

Mr. FILNER. There is a power plant in my district in southern San Diego County, the biggest power plant in my area, and in January during a stage-3 emergency that we had, stage-3 alerts, the biggest generator of their four at this plant, a 250-megawatt generator, was somehow removed from service. This was at a time of a stage-3 alert.

Mr. SHERMAN. And the other turbines in the same plant were generating electricity and selling it for prices 50 and 100 times the rates being charged.

Mr. FILNER. Exactly. Not only were they making profits, I had thousands of people at plants in San Diego being sent home because their places of employment were blacked out or they had certain agreements with the utilities that they had to turn down their power during a stage-3 alert.

So we have the incredible situation of blackouts in San Diego and other parts of the State, almost fatal collisions, by the way, at intersections as the lights went out, possible health fatalities, businesses. I had the biggest business in my district, one of the biggest businesses in my district come to me recently and say, they are going to have to leave San Diego and California because they cannot live with this uncertainty.

So we have the power. The power is there. By the way, when we asked them why they did not produce, a TV station had talked to one of the people working there, and they revealed the logs and they said, they just turned it off. First they told me, well, we turned it off because there was environmental problems, restrictions, and we went to the air quality board and they said, that is a lie, there is no restrictions. They said there were mechanical problems, but the mechanics there said there were none. Then they said the system operator in the State did not ask them; it turned out that they did.

So we have this incredible situation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, a stage-3 alert is a desperate situation where we are asking everybody to conserve and produce.

Mr. FILNER. And, the blackouts occurred at a time when our capacity for production theoretically is 45,000 megawatts, the demand in the winter-time when air-conditioning is not on is about 30,000, so we have a 30,000 megawatt demand, we have a 45,000 capacity. Economics 101 says there ought to be sufficient supply at a reasonable price. We had blackouts, and we had blackouts because of the situation that the gentleman described earlier.

I wonder if the gentleman might share with us also the experience of those with public power; that is, there are 3,000 communities around this country that have public power. The City of Los Angeles, which the gentleman knows very well, produces its own power and distributes it. The City of Sacramento I think has its own power supply. Those cities and those municipalities, those areas that have public power are not under the control, for the most part, of this energy cartel. Does it work?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, it works just fine. In the City of Los Angeles, and I live within the city limits, the prices are the same, no blackouts; we have no problems. Our city produces a little bit more electricity than it needs and sells it to the gentleman's city and others in the west. Occasionally, somebody will say, maybe L.A. is charging San Diego too much or too little, and somebody will write a story about it on page 6 of the newspaper. But the overwhelming story, the headline story is, no story here.

Mr. Speaker, regulated electricity, that is to say privately owned but subject to rate regulation, costs plus profit, worked fine in our State and virtually every other State for 80 to 100 years. Something even more regulated, that is to say the government actually owning the means of production and selling the electricity itself, works fine in Sacramento, the City of Los Angeles, the City of Burbank.

Unregulated power seems to work well in some of the States where their economy is not growing at all and their population relative to the rest of the country is contracting. But in a State like ours that is growing a bit, surrounded by other States that are also experiencing growth, an unregulated market is an invitation to be gouged. The theorists may not have realized that at the time. It seems apparent now. When we try something and it does not work, we should go back to what we had before that was working pretty well.

Mr. Speaker, the Federal Government will not let us. We get lectures from the White House, lectures about how, if only we had elected Republicans, this would not have happened. But we are having a hard time hearing the lecture, because we are bound and gagged by Federal law that will not allow us to go back to the same system that worked so well for us.

Mr. FILNER. Mr. Speaker, if I can sum up from my perspective and then give the gentleman a similar chance, California is being bled dry by a cartel of energy wholesalers. We are being charged at a rate of $3 billion a month, and the State is purchasing that because the utilities are bankrupt. Our first job is to get down those prices. We have legislation which virtually all of the Democrats and some Republicans from the States of California, Washington, and Oregon are supporting, which establishes cost-based rates for electricity in the western region. That will bring down the prices and stop the hemorrhaging, while the governor is programmed to build new plants and conserve more has its effect. We must bring down those prices. This Congress has refused to act and is going home for its Memorial Day recess without doing that.

We have to move in addition, for the long range, and it really comes back to the same problem, because these cartels will not do the research for renewable resources, for sustainable energy. We could in California be pretty self-sufficient with photovoltaic cells if we brought down the cost and purchased in mass. We have to do more work in that. San Diego, as are other regions in the State, are moving toward a public power authority so we can have our own plant like the one that I described earlier. We can build and have some leverage in the system. We do not have to expropriate the San Diego gas and electric distribution system. At their rate, they will be very happy to do it. But we need some leverage of our own electricity and our own capacity so we can take control of our own future from this cartel.

Whether we looked at gasoline in Chicago or whether we looked at electricity in California or natural gas as it flows, as the gentleman described, from Texas into California, the economic situation is the same. There is no competition, there is no market, there is a manipulated and controlled situation by a small group of major corporations. We must bring them under control, and we as different communities must establish our own sources to get out of their control.

So I thank the gentleman, and I will give him the last word in the few minutes that we have left.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is right to bring up the natural gas prices.

As I indicated, the price of moving natural gas went up by 1,200 percent. That happened right after the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, the same culprit as in the other situation, deregulated the pipelines and allowed them to charge, through a loophole, to charge as much as they wanted to charge. Imagine your home is burning down. You might have one neighbor who, for some reason, does not help you. But only the most malevolent of neighbors would seize your hose, watch your home burn down, hold on to your hose and lecture you about how it is your fault, you should not let the fire break out to begin with.

California is burning. The Federal Government is holding our hose, and we are being hosed by Washington, which will not give us the rate regulation that virtually all Californians want, and will not let us do it ourselves.

Mr. FILNER. Mr. Speaker, we call on the President and this Congress to act today. I thank the gentleman from California, and I thank our colleagues from Illinois.

PATIENT PROTECTION LEGISLATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GRUCCI). Under the Speaker's announced policy of January 3, 2001, the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. GANSKE) is recognized for 22 minutes.

Mr. GANSKE. Mr. Speaker, we are about ready to head home on recess, so I want to speak to my colleagues about something that I think that we should address when we come back from this recess. That is the issue of patient protection legislation.

We have been dealing with this for several years. I have just a few minutes left before we close down for the evening.

This is a really important issue. HMOs are making hundreds of thousands if not millions of decisions each day that can adversely affect the health and lives of the people who are supposed to get their insurance from them.

Mr. Speaker, remember a few years ago the movie As Good as It Gets? We had Helen Hunt talking to Jack Nicholson during the movie about her son who had asthma and was not getting the proper authorization for treatment by her HMO.

She then went into a long string of expletives about her HMO, and I saw something happen in a movie theater I never saw happen at any other time. People stood up, applauded, and clapped for the sentiment that Ms. Hunt was expressing about her HMO.

In fact, we know the sentiment is widespread when we start to see humor, even if it is black humor. Here we have a cartoon about HMOs. We have a doctor at an operating table. We have the HMO bean counter next to him. The doctor says, "scalpel." The HMO bean counter says "pocket knife." The doctor says "suture." The HMO bean counter says "bandaid." The doctor says, "Let's get him to an intensive care unit." The doctor says, "call a cab."

Now, Members may think that is just a joke, it is just funny, except for the fact that down in Texas there was a suicidal man. His doctor recommended that he stay in the hospital. The HMO said, "No, we are going to make the medical judgment that he does not need to be in the hospital. If he stays, we are not going to pay for it."

The families, like most families, they cannot afford an out-of-pocket expense like a hospitalization, so they took this poor patient home. That night, sure enough, he drank half a gallon of anti-freeze and he committed suicide.

That HMO should be liable. They did not even follow the Texas law, which says that in that type of case, they ought to get an expedited external review.

That is why, for instance, stories appear all across the country every so often, things like in the New York Post, "HMO's cruel rules leave her dying for the doc she needs."

Here is another cartoon. The doctor is reading to a patient. The HMO physician says, "Your best option is cremation, $359 fully covered," and the patient says, "This is one of those HMO gag rules, isn't it, Doctor?"

Mr. Speaker, 5 years ago now, Members co-signed a bill that I wrote, 300-plus bipartisan cosponsors, that would ban those HMO gag rules, the rules that would keep a doctor from telling a patient all of their treatment options.

Do Members know what? We could not get the leadership to bring it to the floor, even though I had been promised, even though we could have brought it to the floor under suspension with no amendments, and it would have passed overwhelmingly. We could not get it to the floor. Why? Because the HMO industry is a powerful special interest group.

How about this headline: "What his parents didn't know about HMOs may have killed this baby." Maybe that headline, that real-life headline, spawned this cartoon. We have the maternity hospital. We have a drive-through window. "Now only 6-minute stays for new moms." Remember those HMO rules, drive-through deliveries? The hospital technician says, "Congratulations. Would you like French fries with that?" as mom and dad are pulling out with newborn baby.

How about this cartoon. HMO Claims Department: "No, we don't authorize that specialist. No, we don't cover that operation. No, we don't pay for that medication." Then the HMO reviewer hears something over the telephone and ends up saying, "No, we don't consider this assisted suicide."

Do Members know what? That joke may be funny to some, but it is not funny to this family, this little girl and boy and the father. Because the HMO did not inform their mom that they were putting screws on one of the health centers not to provide her necessary treatment, she ended up dying. This case ended up being covered on the front cover of one of the national news magazines as an example of HMO abuse.

Now, this is really black humor. Here we have an HMO receptionist saying, "Cuddly Care HMO. How can I help you? You are at the emergency room and your husband needs an approval for treatment? Oh, he is gasping, writhing, eyes rolled back in his head? Doesn't sound that serious to me. Clutching at his throat? Turning purple? Uh-huh." Then the reviewer says, "Well, have you heard about an inhaler?" Then the next one is "He is dead?" And the next one says, "Well, then he certainly doesn't need treatment." And finally, the reviewer looks at us and says, "People are always trying to rip us off."

How about the case where this young woman fell 40 feet off a cliff about 70 miles from Washington, D.C. She had to be evacuated to an emergency room and intensive care. She had a broken pelvis, a fractured skull, a broken arm. Her HMO would not pay her bill. She had not phoned ahead for prior authorization. I guess she was supposed to know she was going to fall off a cliff.

Gee, it would be just like that prior cartoon, the HMO saying, "Those patients, they are always trying to rip us off."

Speaking about emergency care, this little boy, when he was 6 months old and needed emergency care in the middle of the night, he had a temperature of about 105, 104, 105, mom phoned the 1-800 number and was told to take him to one specific hospital, the only one the HMO contracted with. Mom said, "Where is it?" The answer on the telephone, "I don't know. Find a map." It turned out it was 70 miles away. "But we are only going to authorize that one hospital."

So they passed several other hospitals, not knowing how sick their little boy is. He has a cardiac arrest. En route, they are lucky, they manage to keep him alive. His mom leaps out of the car carrying the little baby. When they finally get to the emergency room, they put an IV in. They save his life, but they do not save all of this little baby, because he ends up with gangrene of both hands and both feet, which have to be amputated, because that HMO made a medical judgment.

Instead of saying, "Take that little boy to the nearest emergency room right away," they said, "We do not think it is that important. Take him to this one that is 70 miles away, because we can save money that way. We have got a contract with that emergency room."

Before coming to Congress, I was a reconstructive surgeon. I took care of little babies with cleft lips and pallates like this baby. Guess what, 50 percent of the surgeons in this country that do this kind of surgery in the last 2 years have had cases denied like this because this is, according to the HMO, a cosmetic condition.

How did we get to this sorry state? We got to this because 25 years ago, Congress passed a law called the Employee Retirement Income Security Act, which was primarily a pension law meant to be for the benefit of the employee. But somehow or other, health plans got included in this, and along came managed care, which was much more intrusive, and all of a sudden we now have a situation where, under employer plans, health plans do not have to follow any State regulations.

Furthermore, they are not liable or responsible for any of their decisions. Think about this. As far as I know, there is only one group of people or an institution in this country that is free of responsibility for their decisions, that is foreign diplomats, except for the HMOs and employer health plans.

That little boy who lost both hands and his feet, under Federal law that plan is responsible for nothing except the cost of his amputations.

That, unfortunately, has led employer health plans to cut corners. Not all of them. Some plans try to do the right thing. But some plans have definitely cut corners in order to save money, in order to satisfy their stockholders.

That has resulted in unfair processes and unfair denials. And, furthermore, under this Federal law, it basically says that a health plan can define medical necessity in any way they want to.

They can say in their contract that we define medical necessity as the cheapest, least expensive care. That means, for instance, that the little child that had the cleft lip that I just showed my colleagues would not be able to get that. The HMO could deny a surgical correction which is standard of care. Maybe we would just put a piece of plastic in the roof of his mouth, because after all that would be the cheapest least expensive care.

Mr. Speaker, that is the way it works under this Federal law, which took away the oversight from States where it had resided for 200-plus years in this country.

I think that is unconstitutional. I think that is an abridgement of the 10th amendment, but it is incumbent on Congress to fix that, because it was Congress that created this problem 25 years ago.

Now, I am not the only one who thinks this. The Federal judiciary thinks this, too. In fact, Judge Pickering, the father of one of our colleagues here in the House, told me that he thinks we need to fix this. He has come up against cases like this. Here we have a statement from Judge Arbis in Pomeroy v. John Hopkins. He says the prevalent system of utilization review now in effect in most health care programs may warrant a reevaluation of ERISA by Congress so that its central purpose of protecting employees may be reconfirmed.

Another judge, Judge Gorton, in Turner v. Fallon says even more disturbing to this court is the failure of Congress to amend a statute that, due to the changing realities of the modern health care system, has gone conspicuously awry from its original intent.

We are talking about ERISA. We are talking about messages coming to us from the Federal bench.

Judge Bennett says in Prudential Insurance v. National Park Medical Center, if Congress wants the American citizens to have access to adequate health care, then Congress must accept its responsibility to define the scope of ERISA preemption and to enact legislation that will ensure every patient has access to that care.

The Supreme Court has looked at this and the Federal courts are working their way towards this goal case by case modifying this ERISA law, because they are seeing gross inequities, but it is a slow process.

Mr. Speaker, what are the courts doing? They are remanding these medical judgment cases back to the States.

The Supreme Court in Pegram v. Herdrich said decisions involving benefits stay in ERISA, but decisions involving medical judgment should go to the States where they have traditionally resided, where we have 200 years of case law. That is what they should be doing. That is what is in the Ganske-Dingell bill, the McCain-Edwards bill that should come before the House and before the Senate.

But there is an alternative. The alternative is, oh, let us just move all of that into the Federal courts. I cannot believe that Republicans would propose federalizing an entire area of health care.

Are we not the party that traditionally says this should be a purview for States? There are about how many States, there are now nine States that have passed HMO accountability laws, Arizona, California, Georgia, Louisiana, Maine, Oklahoma, Texas, the home State of President Bush, Washington, and West Virginia.

They have all enacted legislation that permits injured patients or their estates to hold health plans responsible for negligent decisions.

You know what? One of the bills on the other side of the Capitol, the House rules prevent me from naming names, not the McCain-Edwards bill, let us just say the Breaux-Frist bill, the Breaux-Frist bill would move all of that jurisdiction into Federal courts. That is a bad idea. It is unconstitutional if my colleagues care about the 10th amendment. But more than that, there are a lot of other reasons.

Let us look at them. We need to decide, should the proposed legislation, is it within the core functions of the Federal system? I am going to talk about that. Whether Federal courts have the capacity to take on that new business without additional resources; whether the Federal courts have the capacity to form their core functions and to fulfill their mandate for just, speedy and inexpensive determination of actions.

Chief Justice Rehnquist said this, the principle was enunciated by Abraham Lincoln in the 19th century. Dwight Eisenhower in the 20th century, matters that can be handled adequately by the States should be left to them; matters that cannot be handled should be undertaken by the Federal Government.

In a proposal for a long-range plan for the Federal courts, Rehnquist has said, Congress should commit itself to conserving the Federal courts as a distinctive judicial forum. Civil and criminal jurisdiction should be a sign to the Federal courts only to further clearly define justified national interests leaving to the State courts the responsibility for adjudicating all other matters, and that means specifically health care.

Federal courts are not the appropriate forum for deciding cases from HMO negligent decisions.

Just last year, the Judicial Conference of the United States stated "personal injury claims arising from the provision or denial of medical treatment have historically been governed by State tort law and suits on such claims have traditionally and satisfactorily been resolved primarily in the State system."

The State courts have significant experience in personal injury claims and would be an appropriate forum to consider personal injury actions pertaining to health care treatment. Federal courts cannot handle this. They already have a huge number of judicial vacancies under Federal law.

They are obligated to give priority to criminal cases. Criminal case filings go up every year. You could not get a speedy resolution to these types of decisions, especially if we are coupling this with a review system.

I say to my colleagues we are going to have this debate soon. The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. NORWOOD), the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DINGELL), I, and others, we have modified our bill. We have taken language from Senator NICKLES. We have taken language from the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. HILLARY). We have taken language from the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. SHADEGG).

We have made a good-faith effort to come up with a bill that includes a lot of ideas from other people. We have significant protections for employers. Employers cannot be responsible unless they directly participate in a decision.

The vast majority of employers do not want to have anything to do with a medical decision. They do not even want to know what is going on medically with their employees. It is a matter of privacy, and their employees do not want the employers to know.

So those are real and solid protections. The cost factor for our bill in terms of liability would be less than $2 per month per employee. That is less than the cost of a Big Mac meal.

We should remand these medical judgment decisions back to the States. We should fix the ERISA portion, and we should make sure that people get a fair shake from their HMOs.

This is something, Mr. Speaker, that I expect will come up shortly in the Senate and then come shortly to the House. I implore my colleagues to do the right thing, become familiar with the provisions of our bill, the Ganske-Dingell Bipartisan Patient Protection Law of 2001.

Let us pass this finally and let us do something for all of our constituents, all of them have experience with this through either a friend, a family member, a fellow worker. Eighty-five percent of the country has indicated that they think that Congress should pass a law to protect patients from HMO abuses.

Let us get this done finally, and let us put it on the President's desk. Our bill satisfies the President's principles. It is modeled after Texas law, and it would be a great victory for our constituents and the people who get their health care from their employers.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

TRIBUTE TO ROUNDSTONE
ELEMENTARY SCHOOL

HON. HAROLD ROGERS

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 22, 2001

Mr. ROGERS of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to recognize, and offer my congratulations to, Roundstone Elementary School of Mt. Vernon, Kentucky. This year Roundstone Elementary was one of four Kentucky public schools to be recognized by the Department of Education and the National Association of State Title I Directors as a Title I Distinguished School. I was exceedingly glad to learn of this award, and would like to take this time to recognize all the students, teachers, parents, and administrators of Roundstone Elementary for this outstanding achievement.

Title I is the largest federal education program and was established to provide funding for low-income schools. But funding alone does not ensure success at any level. It is how you use the funds that count. As one Roundstone teacher said, "Some people have the misconception that schools with students from low-income families or high-poverty areas will not achieve, but we never think of those factors. We just love students, have high expectations for them, and focus on giving them the best education possible." This year recipients are being recognized for their effective use of Title I funds by providing students with quality instruction, for achieving academic progress, and meeting high standards.

At Roundstone, a small elementary school in rural southeastern Kentucky, the students are achieving results and exceeding expectations. This is a result not only of the student's hard work, but the dedication of their teachers. They realized that the first step toward success was creating an environment in which all students, no matter their ability, can effectively learn. Second, they have designed a curriculum in which students are encouraged to learn and think critically, to delve into science and mathematical problems, and to write creatively. Lastly, the parents of the students are involved throughout the process. It is critically important that parents have proper consultation on their children's curriculum, and the parents at Roundstone have been integral to the program's success.

It is clear that education has become one of the most important issues to concerned citizens of this nation. Parents, teachers, and public policy makers at the state and national levels know that the wisest investment we as a nation can make is ensuring that our children are given an education to meet the challenges ahead. I, too, share this concern, as do all members of this body. It is a challenge from which we must not shy away.

Again, I want to say congratulations to the students, teachers, and parents of Roundstone Elementary on being recognized as a Title I Distinguished School. In a time when we talk about results and accountability, Roundstone has proven to be a model for other public schools across this nation. We should all be proud of their accomplishments, and I wish them every success in the coming years.

HONORING KATHY FARLEY ON HER RETIREMENT

HON. SCOTT McINNIS

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 22, 2001

Mr. McINNIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment to recognize the career of one of Southern Colorado's leading citizens. Kathy Farley resigned from her position as executive director of the Southern Colorado Family Foundation so she can spend more time with her grandchildren and family. The work that Kathy has done over the years helping the community has earned her the thanks of Congress.

A Colorado native, Kathy graduated from Denver East High School in 1955. She received a Bachelors of Art in history and education from the University of Colorado at Boulder in 1959. Through out her career, Kathy served on many boards including serving as a Pueblo County Commissioner from 1991-1995. She is also a member and past president of the Pueblo Conservancy District as well as the vice-president of the State Board of Parks and Recreation.

Kathy is also the co-founder and trustee of distinction of the Sangre de Cristo Arts Center. In 1990, Kathy was named the Business Women's Network Women of the Year and in 1985 she was given the Outstanding Woman Award by the Pueblo Girls Club.

Kathy and her husband are original donors to the Southern Colorado Family Foundation. The foundation was created for the purpose of helping the citizens of the region create enduring, yet flexible charitable contributions that enhance the quality of life in their communities. "I am proud to have served as the foundation's first executive director. . . We have a stable foundation. The future is secure." Under Kathy's leadership, the foundation raised $825,000 in cash and pledges and will most likely reach its goal of $1 million by mid-year. "We have worked hard to achieve goals and to support the causes the community believes in."

Mr. Speaker, Kathy Farley deserves the thanks and praise of Congress for her work both in and for the community. I would like to wish Kathy good luck during her well-deserved retirement.

You have earned it Kathy!

IN HONOR OF PAT COLLINS

HON. STENY H. HOYER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the late John Patrick Collins, best known simply as Pat. A prolific businessman with an insatiable appetite for public service and an insurmountable sense of humility, Pat Collins was an individual who touched the lives of many and made a true difference in his community.

Pat entered the automotive sales industry in the early sixties, and became the general manager of a dealership before the age of 30. His ambitions knew no horizons. He eventually bought, helped turn around, and prospered from a failing dealership in northern Virginia. With those profits, he was often found working behind the scenes, donating resources to several organizations, often anonymously, to causes which he felt were important.

Pat's early life was impacted by living in a large, close-knit family of nine children where everyone looked out for one another, especially his brother Brian who was born with Down Syndrome. From this life experience, Pat became an outspoken advocate of the mentally impaired and fought to assure their equal rights. When it was discovered that a local facility was neglecting patient care, Pat devoted his time and energy to help bring about changes to remedy conditions for current and future patients. He was constantly speaking out for those who could not speak out for themselves.

Those who knew Pat best will always remember him as an incredibly bright man whose intellect was surpassed only by his generosity. Pat's departure leaves a significant void in the community where he was well known for his uncanny ability to cut directly to the heart of a matter and craft a common-sense solution. Pat Collins played an important role in the lives of many individuals who relied greatly on his counsel, advice, and mentoring to assist in running businesses, operating community projects, or putting together deals and programs to improve a community. As a philanthropist, Pat generously gave to several organizations, including Gonzaga College High School, St. Mary's Ryken High School, Calvert Hospice, and the Calvert County Chapter of the American Cancer Society.

Pat Collins is survived by his wife Ann; three children, John R., Daniel E. Collins, and Mary Mulford, all of St. Leonard; two sisters, Margaret Mary O'Brien of Rockville and Sheila Cotter of Annapolis; three brothers, Paul of Ocean City, Edward of Silver Spring, and Terence of Arnold; and three granddaughters.

Mr. Speaker, I was always impressed by Pat's energy and ability to get things done during his lifetime. He will be missed by many. Fortunately for us, his contributions of his time, energy, and money will benefit the entire southern Maryland community for decades to come. Pat Collins was a giant who was successful in life, but who never forgot his roots and always gave back to his community. I ask my colleagues to join me in honoring this great American who leaves behind a loving family and many admirers who will miss him greatly.

INTRODUCTION OF THE "MERIT SYSTEM PROTECTION BOARD ADMINISTRATIVE DISPUTE RESOLUTION ACT OF 2001"

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced the "Merit Systems Protection Board Administrative Dispute Resolution Act of 2001." Support for ADR enjoys a rare consensus among those knowledgeable with formal litigation and administrative dispute processes. Resulting savings redound to the benefit of those involved and more broadly, to the taxpayers at large.

The MSPB is an independent adjudicatory body that hears appeals from Federal agency personnel disputes. MSPB judges hear a broad range of complex cases that affect thousands of Federal employees and the agencies for which they work. Over the last decade, MSPB judges have seen their jurisdiction steadily increase without a corresponding increase in resources. Last year, the Board handled nearly 8,000 cases with a staff of only 71 administrative judges. This bill would help reduce this caseload by establishing a pilot, three year early intervention ADR program at the Board. A chief strength of the program is that it makes ADR available to parties before their positions harden in preparation for formal litigation before the Board.

Until 1990, MSPB judges received compensation equivalent to that provided Immigration, Social Security and Administrative Law Judges. Since 1990, however, the wage disparity between MSPB judges and other administrative judges has detrimentally affected the Board's ability to attract and retain top judges. Over the last four years alone, the Board has lost nearly 20 percent of its judges to other adjudicatory agencies.

The Conference Report to the 1999 Omnibus Appropriations Act recognized the need to accord pay equity to MSPB, Immigration, and Administrative Law Judges. Last year, I introduced, and the House passed legislation to address this recognized inequality. Like the previous legislation, the current bill restores a measure of fairness to MSPB judge compensation vis-a-vis Immigration, Social Security and Administrative Law Judges.

Passage of the MSPB Administrative Dispute Resolution Act of 2001 will combat debilitating MSPB attrition rates and reduce costs to taxpayers by ensuring the success of the early intervention ADR program. Support for ADR is broad and its benefits are clear, and I urge prompt passage of the bill.

Mr. GILLMOR. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I rise today to pay special tribute to an outstanding individual from the State of Ohio. Mr. Fred Fabrizio, a physical therapist, is celebrating 39 years of distinguished service to his community in Tiffin and throughout Ohio.

Mr. Fabrizio, originally a Youngstown native, attended Heidelberg College in Tiffin prior to entering The Ohio State University, College of Physical Therapy. After graduating in 1962, he and his wife, Carmella moved to Peoria, IL. After only a short year they moved back to the town where they first met and fell in love.

He has competed and finished the prestigious Hawaiian Ironman Triathlon twice. He has also competed in America's top cross county ski race, the Birkebeiner, over 10 times. At present, Mr. Fabrizio is training for a 100-mile ultra-marathon in Leadville, CO.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Fabrizio's dedication and service have earned him the highest regard for his character as a husband to his charming and dedicated wife, Kathy, father, grandfather, and physical therapist. At this time I ask my colleagues to join me in wishing Mr. Fabrizio and his family all the best in his retirement and future endeavors.

MEMORIAL DAY 2001: COURAGE AND HEARTACHE

HON. WILLIAM D. DELAHUNT

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. DELAHUNT. Mr. Speaker, for millions of Americans, this weekend's Memorial Day observance carries deep and personal significance. For two residents of southeastern Massachusetts, Lucy Duffy and Jim Cadigan, the solemn occasion will echo with courage and heartache, seared with the pain and pride of sacrifice on behalf of a grateful Nation.

HEADING THE CALL

When young Americans heeded President Woodrow Wilson's call to arms, one of those who crossed the Atlantic in the name of freedom was Sgt. Charles De Vries, an Army medic stationed at the Camp Mars-Sur-Allier, one of the largest American base hospitals in Europe.

During World War I, the French village of Saint Parize le Châtel and its neighboring hamlet of Moiry was home to this 44,000-bed facility. Day and night, Sgt. De Vries and his colleagues would tend to the wounded and dying.

In war's shadow, Sgt. De Vries met Rebecca Goethe, a young French girl from a nearby town. They were married and, after the Armistice, returned to the United States to start a new life and family.

This weekend, eight decades later, the daughter of that doughboy and village girl will represent the United States at ceremonies honoring Camp Mars-Sur-Allier—and the men and women who served and died there.

On Saturday and Sunday, Lucy Duffy of Brewster, Massachusetts, will represent the United States as the Cercle Culturel d'Entradide Généalogique dedicates a permanent exhibit to the hospital.

The people of the towns of St. Parize le Châtel and Moiry have never forgotten those who gave so unselfishly of themselves in the name of world peace. Located at the site of national cemetery where 2,000 victims of the Great War are buried, the memorial is inscribed with these moving words: Aux Américains Morts Pour la France, Le Droit et La Liberté 1916–1918 (To the Americans who died for France, Right, and Liberty).

AN AMERICAN HERO

Jim Cadigan of Hingham, Massachusetts, is a genuine American hero. Like an entire generation of Americans, he assumed the responsibility of our combat commitment in World War Two.

On February 26, 1945, Second Lieutenant Cadigan, a member of Company C, 20th Armored Infantry Battalion, 10th Armored Division, led a platoon advancing on the German town of Zerf. Upon hearing that a second platoon had been ambushed and was pinned down by enemy fire, he charged fortified enemy positions perched on high ground and, without concern for his own safety, single-handedly wiped out two German machine gun nests.

Dozens of witnesses have testified that Lt. Cadigan killed or wounded 50 Germans and took 85 prisoners. The trapped US platoon was able to escape and reorganize, saving scores of American lives.

Without Jim Cadigan's heroism, it's likely that none of those men, or their children, would be alive today. To this day, at annual reunions, his comrades from that battlefield long ago in Zerf gather to swap old stories and meet new grandchildren; each year, his comrades travel long distances to salute a man who, quite literally, saved their lives.

Jim Cadigan is a legend in his home town of Hingham as well. This weekend, he'll serve as Grand Marshal of the Hingham Memorial Day Parade. People of all ages, from WW2 vets to elementary school kids, will have the opportunity to greet the brave soldier form down the street who has inspired such pride and respect.

HEARTS OF MEN

In cities and towns all across America, Memorial Day will be marked with parades down Main Street, patriotic speeches on the town square, backyard barbecues and Little League games in the park. In many ways, this reflects the distinctly American values that Sgt. De Vries and Lt. Cadigan went overseas to fight to protect.

For Cadigan and Duffy families, and countless others, Memorial Day is also a time for a quiet pilgrimage to cemeteries and memorials, for personal remembrance and reflection that stand the test of time.

More than 20 centuries ago, Pericles offered a tribute to fallen Greek warriors that echoes to us through antiquity: "Not only are they commemorated by columns and inscriptions, but there dwells also an unwritten memorial of them, graven not on stone but in the hearts of men."

Mr. GARY MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute and honor the accomplishments of Mr. James P. Anderson of Upland, California.

Mr. Anderson is the outgoing Chairman of the Board for the City of Upland Chamber of Commerce. According to his peers, Mr. Anderson has demonstrated personal and civic leadership in his role as Chairman and was actively involved in his community. He has achieved an impressive record of career and civic accomplishments and, in doing so, has earned the admiration and respect of those who have the privilege of working with him. I would like to congratulate him on these accomplishments and thank him for his service to his community.

INTRODUCTION OF THE NATIONAL HEALTH SERVICE CORPS REINVESTMENT ACT

HON. CAROLYN B. MALONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mrs. MALONEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join with my good friends SHERY BOEHLERT, MIKE CAPUANO and many other of my distinguished colleagues to introduce the National Health Service Corps Reinvestment Act.

Signed into law by President Nixon, the National Health Service Corps (NHSC) has placed more than 22,000 health care professionals in rural and urban areas across the country. Launched in 1972 to combat the growing number of communities without a health care provider, the Service Corps is a critical element of our nation's health care safety net.

The National Health Service Corps Reinvestment Act of 2001 will reauthorize the National Health Service Corps for five years and increases its funding by 50 percent. In addition, this legislation amends the tax code, making the loan repayment and the scholarship program tax exempt. Today, the scholarships and loan payments are considered taxable income. This measure would eliminate the federal tax requirement on both of these programs. By cutting taxes for students and practitioners, it removes the tax burden on these health care professionals and allows more money to be reinvested into the Service Corps.

Adding needed flexibility, the National Health Service Corps Reinvestment Act of 2001 also establishes a demonstration project to allow the NHSC scholarship and loan repayment programs recipients to fulfill their commitment on a part-time basis.

Lastly, this legislation includes two additional measures to simplify the application process for both the National Health Service Corps and community health centers.

Today, more than 2,400 Service Corps clinicians serve in every state, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico and the Pacific Basin. In 1999, in my great state of New York, 240 National Health Service Corps practitioners provided essential health services to thousands of New Yorkers in need (specifically, 131 primary care physicians, 32 physician assistants, 27 nurse practitioners, 27 dentists and oral health clinicians, 13 certified nurse midwives, and 10 mental and behavioral health professionals served in the NHSC in New York).

For many Americans, community health centers provide their only access to a doctor, a dentist, a nurse midwife, or a mental health professional. In many instances, the treatment offered in these health clinics is provided by a Service Corps clinician. The National Health Service Corps saves lives every day by providing early, preventive health care to those in poor, rural, urban, or otherwise medically underserved communities.

Nearly two million individuals in over 4,000 health shortage areas receive their health care through the National Health Service Corps. Unfortunately, only about 12 percent of the overall need is being met by the program. In 1999, the Corps had to turn away one-half of the underserved communities that requested a provider, because of a lack of funds.

Communities depend on these Service Corps clinicians, so we must strengthen the NHSC. Unfortunately, the authorization for this successful program expired in 2000. Illustrating the urgent need for congressional action, last year we were faced with press accounts such as "Cuts in Loan Program Squeeze Doctors Who Work With Poor," [The New York Times, 7/30/00] and "Shortchanging Young MDs" [Boston Globe, 8/1/00]. M.J. Murphy, a nurse practitioner and constituent of mine, was included in the New York Times story. Ms. Murphy works at a health clinic which lost its eligibility last year due to a lack of Service Corps funding.

As a representative of nearly a dozen teaching hospitals and several nursing, dental and medical schools, a modernized National Health Service Corps is important for the constituents of my district. Beyond my district, a healthy and strengthened National Health Service Corps will continue to meet the medical needs of underserved and vulnerable populations across the country, as it has for nearly thirty years.

So, on behalf of the millions of Americans receiving quality health care from Service Corps clinicians, I urge my fellow colleagues to join me in support of the National Health Service Corps Reinvestment Act.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

TRIBUTE TO ATHENS-LIMESTONE HOSPITAL

HON. ROBERT E. (BUD) CRAMER, JR.

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. CRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor Athens-Limestone Hospital on fifty years of outstanding service to their community. I congratulate Athens-Limestone on this accomplishment and I believe their excellence is reflected in the countless patients that have received top-of-the-line medical care and caring attention during their stay with the hospital.

Since the people of Limestone County came together in 1945 and began planning this hospital and since it opened its doors on May 28, 1951, Athens-Limestone has been a role model for other communities on how to be successful in keeping its neighbors healthy.

I congratulate the board members, administrative staff, medical staff and service personnel—for they are the real key behind the hospital's success for the past half a century. Athens-Limestone has grown and expanded to their current status with over one hundred patient beds, sixteen out-patient surgery beds, eleven new born nursery beds and many more specialized services.

This is a special anniversary for the Hospital and I congratulate them on their accomplishments. On behalf of the people of the 5th District of Alabama and the House of Representatives, I share my gratitude to Athens-Limestone for their good work these past fifty years and I wish them many, many more anniversaries like this one.

SALUTE TO CLIVE DAVIS

HON. MARK FOLEY

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a man who is equally famous for his many contributions to the music industry as he is for his dedication to public service.

I speak of course, of industry legend Clive Davis.

From Radio and Records Magazine's "Most Influential Record Executive of the Past Twenty Years" and multiple Grammy Award winner to the Congress of Racial Equality's "Martin Luther King, Jr. Humanitarian of the Year," Clive Davis' gifts to American culture are great.

He has personally helped launch the careers of some of our country's most cherished artists including Janis Joplin, Billy Joel, Bruce Springsteen, Whitney Houston, Barry Manilow, Carlos Santana, Herbie Hancock and Pink Floyd just to name a few.

The only person ever to receive the T.J. Martell Foundation's "Humanitarian of the Year" award twice, Clive Davis is also committed to helping his fellow man. He's given much of himself and his money to support HIV/AIDS research.

Mr. Speaker, please let the RECORD reflect this Congress' appreciation for his efforts.

May 23, 2001

TRIBUTE TO RETIRING DISTRICT JUSTICE LEONARD M. McDEVITT

HON. CURT WELDON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. WELDON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, on May 31st Darby Township will be seeing the last of Leonard "Lenny" McDevitt as their district justice. He will be retiring after many years of faithful service on the bench, but will no doubt remain involved in the community he loves so much.

District Justice Leonard M. McDevitt has been an indispensable part of the justice system in Darby Township since 1974. Justice McDevitt has shown outstanding service and dedication to his community for almost three decades. For example, while Justice McDevitt had the choice of rotating nights with other justices, he voluntarily worked from 4:30 p.m. to 10:30 p.m. for the last 27 years. His dedication and selflessness made life easier for dozens of his colleagues on the bench. A man who has shown such dedication to his community deserves the respect of all who know him. His good work has impacted more people than he could ever realize.

Replacing a man like Justice McDevitt will be difficult indeed. I salute Justice McDevitt for being a man of faithful dedication and as someone who truly helped the community he resides in. He is someone to be admired and respected for the dedication that he has shown over the past 27 years.

IN MEMORY OF HERSCHEL J.
GADDY

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, it is with deep sadness that I inform the House of the death of Herschel J. Gaddy, of rural Marshall, Missouri. He was 81.

Herschel Gaddy, a son of Homer and Effie Treon Gaddy, was born in Fair Grove, Missouri, on July 23, 1919. He graduated from Missouri University, where he was a member of FarmHouse fraternity, in 1941. Herschel married Dona Nella Stiles on February 1, 1941. After graduating from college he joined the U.S. Army and was stationed in Missouri, Oklahoma and Oregon. He then served as Lieutenant Colonel in Sicily and North Africa during World War II.

After completing his tour of duty, Herschel served as Assistant County Agent in Saline County, for the University of Missouri Extension in Bethany and as Saline County Agricultural Agent. Mr. Gaddy also spoke about agriculture issues on a weekly radio show on KMMO radio in Marshall. Herschel completed his Masters degree from Missouri University in 1969. He was then appointed Area Agronomist for Saline, Chariton and Carroll counties. When Herschel retired in 1975, he had served the area for 27 years.

Herschel was also a member of many local clubs. He served as president of Marshall's Chamber of Commerce and was a 50-year member of the Trilumina Lodge, Number 205 of the Order of Masons, the Order of Eastern Star Marshall Chapter 408. He was also involved in the local American Legion and Veterans of Foreign Wars. Herschel was a long-time volunteer for the Friends of Arrow Rock and was commander of the historic reenactment group, the First Brigade, First Regiment, Missouri Militia.

As a longtime member of the First Christian Church, Herschel taught Sunday school and served as chairman of the church board. He was a board member of the Missouri School of Religion's Center for Rural Ministry. Herschel also served as county campaign manager for many of my elections.

THE UPCOMING MARRIAGE OF STEVE HOWELL AND KYRA
FISHBECK

HON. GARY G. MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. GARY MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, it is with heartfelt joy that I rise to offer my best wishes for the upcoming marriage of Steve Howell and Kyra Fishbeck.

Steve Howell has worked in my Capitol Office for approximately a year and a half. During this time, I have witnessed his great love for Kyra. It is obvious to anyone who knows Steve that his bride-to-be, Kyra, is the true joy in his life.

On Saturday, Steve and Kyra will take their wedding vows, pledging to love one another for the rest of their lives. These are words that should not be uttered lightly or taken without serious thought and consideration. However, I know that Steve and Kyra have prepared for this moment and are anxiously anticipating this special day.

Having been married to my lovely bride for 28 years, I know that marriage is a wonderful institution. It is my hope that Steve and Kyra will be a blessing to one another, helpmates in all aspects of life, and forever cognizant of the love they feel today.

Mr. Speaker, I ask this 107th Congress to join me in congratulating Steven Howell on having found the woman of his dreams and wishing this young couple a lifetime of happiness together.

THE BUSH ADMINISTRATION—SERVING THE NEEDS OF THE ENERGY INDUSTRY

HON. ALCEE L. HASTINGS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. HASTINGS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my extreme disbelief that the Bush Administration has once again turned its back on the American people and sided with the interests of big gas and oil. I would think that after calling for more environmental rollbacks than any other Administration in the 21st century, the Bush Administration would not want to harm the environment more than it already has when writing its energy policy. I would also think that after neglecting the needs of working class families and pushing a tax cut that benefits the wealthiest one percent of tax payers, the Bush Administration might take into account the needs of the American people when writing its energy policy. But as we can see from the Bush Energy Plan, I would be wrong to think these things. As we can see from the Bush Energy Plan, I would be wrong to think that this Administration has any plans or desire to represent the interests and needs of the American people.

For 117 days, the Bush Big Oil Team met behind closed doors to write an energy policy that it claimed would provide a long-term solution to America's energy woes. Unfortunately, it is clear that the Administration's energy proposal is nothing more than a hand tool of the already profiting energy industry. The only long-term plan the Bush Big Oil Team came up with is one that fills the pockets of the Administration's closest friends, the oil and gas companies. Even more, the plan neglects to address the need for immediate consumer relief. Americans are paying more for energy today than they have ever paid. It is time to provide them with relief and the Bush Energy Plan does not.

One month ago, I came to the floor and asked, "What exactly is the Bush energy plan?" Today, I come to the floor and now ask, "How is the Bush energy plan going to work?" The energy plan released by the Administration last week relies heavily upon drilling in some of our country's most pristine areas and does not focus on the exploration of renewable energy sources. If we do not consider a long-term energy plan that includes the exploration of renewable resources, then we are just wasting our time.

From drilling in the ANWR to drilling off of Florida's Panhandle, the Administration is once again neglecting the responsibility we have to protect our environment for nothing more than a short-term solution. It is widely accepted that roughly 3.2 billion barrels of economically recoverable oil can be found under the ANWR. Those 3.2 billion barrels, however, represent a mere six-month supply of oil in the United States, hardly enough to build an effective energy policy. The overall effect that drilling in the Gulf of Mexico could have in the U.S. is even less significant. The 396 million barrels of oil the Administration claims "can play an important role in our national energy strategy," barely represent a three-week supply of oil in the United States. The 2.9 trillion of oil in the natural gas represent less than a two-month supply of natural gas in the United States. You do not need to be an energy expert to recognize that this plan does not even begin to address a long-term solution to our country's energy crisis.

Finally, the Administration's energy plan fails to address the immediate need for consumer relief. In the past three weeks, the average cost of gas per gallon has increased by more than 9.5 cents to an all time high of $1.77 a gallon! Some drivers in the U.S. are paying more than $2.00 a gallon. At a time oil company profits are up more than 40 percent from this time last year, consumers are paying more at the pumps and in their homes. In failing to address this lopsided consumer-supplier relationship, the Administration has endorsed the oil industry's gauging of gas prices.

Mr. Speaker, there is little question that America is faced with an energy crisis of an enormous magnitude. Our country needs to look at new ways of creating energy. If current trends continue, Americans will use more energy in the coming years than ever. The Administration's idea to drill wherever an oil well will fit, however, will simply continue to fill the pockets of oil and gas industry executives and never actually solve our current crisis. If we are going to get serious about solving our energy woes, then we need to pursue research and development programs that examine energy efficiency, renewable energy, and types of energy, including solar, biomass, hydrogen, geothermal, and hydropower. At the same time, America's energy policy cannot neglect the responsibility Americans have to the environment. I will not support the exploration of a new energy policy at unnecessary costs to the environment and public health. It is time to get serious about America's energy policy. So far, however, the Bush Administration has done nothing more than turn its back on the American people.

MINOR ANIMAL SPECIES HEALTH
ACT OF 2001

HON. CHARLES W. "CHIP" PICKERING

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. PICKERING. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in order to bring attention to a problem faced by livestock and food animal producers, animal and pet owners, zoo and wildlife biologists, and the animals themselves, which unfortunately goes largely unnoticed except by those who are directly affected.

There currently exists a severe shortage of approved animal drugs for use in minor animal species. These minor animal species include those animals other than cattle, horses, chickens, turkeys, dogs, and cats. In addition, there exists a similar shortage of pharmaceutical medicines for major animal species for diseases that occur infrequently or which occur only in limited geographic areas. Due to the lack of availability of these minor use drugs, millions of animals go either untreated for illnesses or treatment is delayed. This results not only in unnecessary animal suffering but may threaten human health as well.

Because of limited market opportunity, low profit margins, and enormous capital investment required, it is generally not economically feasible for drug manufacturers to pursue research and development and then approval for medicines used in treating minor species and infrequent conditions and diseases.

In addition to the animals themselves, without access to these necessary minor use drugs, farmers and ranchers also suffer. An unhealthy animal that is left untreated can spread disease through an entire stock of its fellow species resulting in severe economic losses and hardships to agriculture producers.

For example, Mr. Speaker, sheep ranchers lost nearly $45 million worth of livestock alone in 1999. The sheep industry estimates that if it had access to effective and necessary minor use medicines, grower reproduction costs for these animals would be cut by upwards of 15%. In addition, feedlot deaths would be reduced 1-2% adding approximately $8 million of revenue to the industry.

The catfish industry, a top agriculture sector in my home state of Mississippi which generates enormous economic opportunities for our people, especially within the Mississippi Delta, estimates its losses at $60 million per year attributable to minor diseases for which drugs are not available. The U.S. aquaculture industry overall, including food as well as ornamental fish, produces and raises over 800 different species. Unfortunately, the industry has only five drugs approved for use in treating aquaculture diseases. The result is tremendous economic hardship and animal suffering within the industry.

Mr. Speaker, joined with my colleagues, Mr. COMBEST of Texas, Mr. POMBO of California, Mr. OTTER of Idaho, Mr. SIMPSON of Idaho, and Ms. THURMAN of Florida, I resolve to correct this unfortunate situation by introducing the Minor Animal Species Health Act of 2001. This legislation will allow companies the opportunity to develop and approve minor use drugs which are of vital interest to a large number of animal industries. Our legislation incorporates the major proposals of the FDA's Center for Veterinary Medicine to increase the availability of drugs for minor animal species and rare diseases in all animals.

The Animal Drug Availability Act of 1996 required the Food and Drug Administration to provide Congress with a report, describing administrative and legislative proposals to improve and enhance the animal drug approval process for minor uses and minor species of new animal drugs. This report by FDA, delivered to Congress in December of 1998, laid out nine proposals. Eight of the FDA's proposals required statutory changes. The bill I am introducing today reflects the changes called for in the Agency's minor species/minor use report. The Act creates incentives for animal drug manufacturers to invest in product development and obtain FDA marketing approvals. Furthermore, it creates a program very similar to the successful Human Orphan Drug Program that has, over the past twenty years, dramatically increased the availability of drugs to treat rare human diseases. Mr. Speaker, besides providing benefits to livestock producers and animal owners, this measure will develop incentives and sanctioning programs for the pharmaceutical industry while maintaining and ensuring public health.

The Minor Animal Species Health Act of 2001 is supported by the Food and Drug Administration, the American Farm Bureau Federation, the Animal Health Institute, the American Veterinary Medical Association, and virtually every organization representing all genres of minor animal species. This is vital legislation which is desperately needed now. The Act will alleviate much animal suffering, it will promote the health and well-being of minor animal species while protecting and promoting human health, it will benefit pets and improve the emotional security of their owners, benefit various endangered species of aquatic species, and will reduce economic risks and hardships to farmers and ranchers. This is common-sense legislation which will benefit millions of Americans from farmers and ranchers to pet owners. I call on all my colleagues in the House to support the Minor Animal Species Health Act of 2001.

HON. JANICE D. SCHAKOWSKY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Ms. SCHAKOWSKY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to celebrate the life of Monsignor John J. Egan, a man who never wavered in his mission to promote justice and to better the lives of so many people. He struggled on behalf of the poor and working men and women, gave voice to the voiceless, and cared for those pushed aside by our society.

I personally called him a friend and am proud to have worked with him for many years. He was also a friend of every man, woman or child who needed a helping hand, a voice, or simply a sympathetic ear.

Monsignor Egan, a leader who has spoken so eloquently against racism and bigotry, was among the first Catholic priests to join the civil rights movements. He marched in Alabama in the 1960s for equal rights for all people. He was a man who led by example. Monsignor Egan was also instrumental in saving countless families from eviction and life on the streets. He understood that being poor should not translate to being homeless. He stood on many picket lines supporting workers struggling for their right to organize and improve their working conditions.

People throughout the nation knew Monsignor Egan. He was admired by so many from a wide cross section of our society. He has left a lasting impression on those he has met during his years. He received a religious leaders award from Rainbow/PUSH and was honored by the Chicago chapter of the American Jewish Committee, the Travelers and Immigrants Aid, Citizen Action of Illinois to name only a few. Those awards are a testament to his effective social activism.

In honor of his life, I urge that we continue to follow in his steps, learn from his example, and organize for public policies that are fair and equitable. I urge all my colleagues to read the following accounts from the Chicago Tribune, Chicago Sun-Times, and New York Times celebrating Monsignor Egan's life.

[From the Chicago Tribune, May 20, 2001]
MONSIGNOR JOHN EGAN 1916-2001; PRIEST WAS "CONSCIENCE" OF THE CITY
(By Noah Isackson)

Monsignor John "Jack" Egan, a priest whose battles for social justice made him one of Chicago's most influential religious leaders, died Saturday, May 19, in the rectory of Holy Name Cathedral.

"A great priest has gone back to God," said Cardinal Francis George, Catholic archbishop of Chicago.

An archdiocese spokeswoman said Egan, 84, died of cardiovascular disease.

Egan served the Roman Catholic Church for 58 years, bringing his ecumenical approach to Chicago's grittiest haunts and the nation's toughest social problems.

"He was eager to help people," said Bishop Timothy J. Lyne, a friend for more than 65 years. "Especially people who were treated unjustly."

Egan was born in New York but moved to Chicago early and grew up in the Ravenswood neighborhood. He attended DePaul University, then studied for the priesthood at St. Mary of the Lake Seminary in Mundelein. He was ordained in 1943.

In 1965, Egan marched with Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. in Selma, Ala. Later, a photo of him walking with King and other protesters became a call for clergymen across the country to join the civil rights movement.

As director of the Archdiocesan Office of Urban Affairs from 1958 to 1969, Egan became a powerful voice in promoting subsidized housing as a way to fight urban segregation. Later, Egan became an outspoken opponent of public housing and called Cabrini-Green "a concrete monument to the city's racism."

From 1970 to 1983, he was the special assistant to the president at the University of Notre Dame. He returned to Chicago in 1983 as the archdiocese's director of human relations and ecumenism.

"He was the city's conscience," said Rev. Robert McLaughlin, pastor of Holy Name Cathedral. "He was a conscience not only to the politicians and the people, but the church as well, a man who dared to be a gadfly and raise important issues."

"He really had a way of challenging people on very serious moral issues without alienating them," said Rev. John Minogue, president of DePaul University. "And with that, he kept the dialogue open so that change could actually happen."

Egan had headed DePaul's Office of Community Affairs for four years at the time of his death. The university honored Egan by naming its urban think tank and community service organization after him, calling it the Egan Urban Center.

In 1993, thousands of people attended a celebration at Holy Name Cathedral marking the 50th anniversary of Egan's ordination to the priesthood. Plumbers hosted a similar celebration at Plumbers Hall on the West Side. Buses were chartered to bring the monsignor's admirers to and from the event.

He is survived by his sister, Kathleen Egan Martin.

His body will lie in state at Holy Name Cathedral from 3 to 9 p.m. Monday and Tuesday. Mass will be said at 10 a.m. Wednesday at the cathedral.

[From the Chicago Tribune, May 22, 2001]
PRIEST RECALLED AS TIRELESS FIGHTER; HIS KINDNESSES ARE REMEMBERED
(By Kevin Lynch)

When Mary Louise Kurey moved to Chicago four months ago, she was overwhelmed by the size of the city and the scope of its social problems.

But then Monsignor John Egan delivered a sermon one Sunday encouraging parishioners at Holy Name Cathedral to take an active approach to their religion.

Within a few weeks, Kurey had joined the fight against Chicago's social ills, starting with a single boy. She began tutoring a 4th grader at St. Joseph School, and she now can't imagine life without their weekly study sessions.

"I was new to the city, and I felt a little shy about getting involved," said Kurey, 26. "He made me feel very much at home . . . and inspired me to reach out like he did in his life."

Kurey was one of hundreds at Holy Name Monday to pay respects to Egan, 84, who died Saturday in the church rectory.

His body lay in state Monday during visitation, which will continue Tuesday from 3 to 9 p.m. A funeral mass will be said at 10 a.m. Wednesday in the cathedral.

Mayor Richard Daley said the city has lost "one of its most courageous moral and spiritual leaders." Egan "never wavered in his commitment to the poor and underprivileged and to equal rights for all," Daley said in a statement.

"Jack Egan didn't just talk about social change; he worked hard for social change for his entire life, and he helped make Chicago a better city."

Though Egan was best known for championing desegregation and organized labor and improving education and housing for the city's poor, many who filed past his casket Monday remembered his small acts of kindness.

"I bumped into him in the hall one day and introduced myself," said Dan Ursini, 48, a library clerk at DePaul University, where Egan headed the Office of Community Affairs since 1997. "He was a very approachable, down-to-earth person. I doubt that he would have remembered my name, but whenever I saw him after that, he'd take the time to chat."

It was Egan's seemingly inexhaustible dedication to social causes that set him apart from other activists, Ursini said.

"It's one thing to see a person help engineer an important social change during one part of his life, but to see him keep it up 20 or 30 years later, that's even more impressive. In that way, he was a deeply inspiring individual," Ursini said.

Last year, Egan decided to take on the payday loan industry after meeting a parishioner who became trapped in a long cycle of debt after borrowing $100, said Rev. Robert McLaughlin, pastor of Holy Name and a longtime friend of Egan's.

His efforts led to a bill introduced in Springfield this year that would set caps on payday loan interest rates.

[From the Chicago Sun-Times, May 21, 2001]
HOLY NAME MOURNS EGAN
(By Maureen O'Donnell)

Reflecting on his life, Monsignor John J. Egan would say: "You know, I didn't leave any enemies behind."

And then, with a little smile: "They all died before me."

"Jack" Egan was remembered Sunday at Holy Name Cathedral by some of the people who knew him best as a man of courage, compassion and wit.

Usher Bob Gowrylow, 64, marched for civil rights alongside Egan in the 1960s.

"They threw rocks at us and called us the 'n-word,'" said Gowrylow. "It was the most frightening thing."

Bystanders spat on marching priests and nuns, but Egan never faltered.

"He kept walking, linking arms, walking together," Gowrylow said. "He never would falter in anything. The man was unbelievable."

Egan, who died Saturday at age 84, was part of a group of priests whose commitment to justice and civil rights made the Chicago priesthood one of the most exciting in the country, said Father Jack Farry, associate pastor at Holy Name. The monsignor became a hero to Farry while he was in the seminary.

"Before that, priests and sisters kind of stayed out of things," Farry said. "But he made it very clear to people this was something we needed to be involved in."

Egan's commitment to the poor kept him an activist until the end, as he campaigned against payday loan operations. His interest in the issue was stirred when a woman came to Holy Name for help. She couldn't get out from under her debt because of excessive interest.

Egan hopped on a bus to pay off her loan.

"Here's this little 83-year-old guy going to the West Side on a bus with somebody he didn't even know to help them out," said parishioner Ralph Metz, 46, an investigator with the Cook County Public Defender's office.

But he wasn't just a big-picture priest, friends and associates said. A rapt listener, he made each person he spoke with feel like they were the only person in the world.

He used the same conversational starter for everyone, be they a celebrity or everyday Chicagoan: "So, where did you come from?"

People would launch into stories of their childhoods and where they grew up and where they went to school, said Peggy Roach, his administrative assistant of 35 years.

Soon after asking actor Joe Mantegna "Where do you come from?" he had his whole life story, Roach said. He and the actor became fast friends.

Egan would even start conversations on elevators, said Margery Frisbie, who wrote a book about Egan titled An Alley in Chicago: The Ministry of a City Priest.

He made Holy Name feel like a home.

"He used to stop mass to say, 'Hey, you in the back, there's a seat up here,'" said Florence Agosto. "He didn't take it too seriously, even though it was a cathedral. He was an old-time, wonderful priest."

Even when it was 10 below, he was out on the steps in his fedora and topcoat shaking people's hands, said Beverly Todhunter, 73, a downtown retiree.

Sister Anne Marie Dolan remembered his kindness to the homeless people he met on the street.

"I don't think he ever passed any one of them without giving them a donation," she said.

Egan loved classical music and chocolate milk, which enabled him to get all his medications down, Roach said.

Until the very end of his life he interceded on behalf of others. On the day he died he was in great pain, but he knew there were ordinations going on at Holy Name. Despite his discomfort, Roach recounted, Egan asked God to help the new priests:

"Lord, I want to pray for the 10 men being ordained today. Give them courage."

Visitation will be at Holy Name from 3 to 9 p.m. today and Tuesday. His funeral will be at 10 a.m. Wednesday at the cathedral, with burial at All Saints Cemetery in Des Plaines.

JOHN J. EGAN, PRIEST AND RIGHTS ADVOCATE,
IS DEAD AT 84
(By Peter Steinfeld)

Msgr. John J. Egan, a Roman Catholic priest in Chicago whose work on issues of civil rights, changing neighborhoods and poverty shaped church efforts in those areas nationally, died on Saturday in Chicago in the rectory of Holy Name Cathedral. He was 84.

An influential figure for over four decades in both the religious life and neighborhood politics of Chicago, Monsignor Egan exerted an influence that stretched far beyond that city.

His work in the 1960's with Saul Alinsky and Mr. Alinsky's Industrial Areas Foundation laid the groundwork for what is now a national pattern of community organizing projects based on interfaith coalitions of congregations.

Ordained a priest in 1943, Monsignor Egan directed the Cana Conference of Chicago from 1947 to 1958. The conference was a ministry to married couples that developed a marriage preparation program, Pre-Cana, that has also been influential nationally.

From 1958 to 1969, Monsignor Egan directed the Chicago Archdiocesan Office of Urban Affairs, where he became deeply engaged in struggles over racial integration and urban renewal.

In 1965, despite his doctor's orders to avoid stress to a damaged heart, he responded to the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s appeal to members of the clergy to march in Selma, Ala.

He was already known for publicly criticizing the effects of urban renewal projects and public housing on established neighborhoods. He tangled with Mayor Richard J. Daley of Chicago, challenged the University of Chicago's neighborhood renewal plans and complained of "the dictatorial powers" of urban planners like Robert Moses in New York City.

Some proponents of urban renewal and integrated housing attacked Monsignor Egan in turn as a self-interested defender of largely white Catholic neighborhoods. Conservatives, including some pastors, recoiled at his working partnership with Mr. Alinsky, a self-styled radical agitator.

Eventually, Cardinal John Cody disbanded the Office of Urban Affairs in 1969, and Monsignor Egan spent the years from 1970 to 1983 at the University of Notre Dame. There he directed the Institute for Pastoral and Social Ministry, and with Peggy Roach, another veteran of struggles for racial justice, he continued his work of recruiting and advising leaders in community organizations.

Many of those he influenced called him a "surrogate bishop" for Catholics engaged in social and political struggles.

Brought back to Chicago in 1983 by Cardinal Joseph Bernardin to direct the archdiocese's Office of Human Relations and Ecumenism, in 1987 Monsignor Egan became head of the Office of Community Affairs at DePaul University in Chicago, a position he held until his death.

John McGreevy, a historian at Notre Dame and the author of "Parish Boundaries" (University of Chicago Press, 1996), a prize-winning study of the Catholic Church's handling of racial issues in Northern cities, compared Monsignor Egan to "the classic parish priests early in the century who were great politically skilled organizers." But Monsignor Egan, Professor McGreevy said, "made the transition to organizing outside the church as well as within it."

Monsignor Egan did not shy from internal church controversies. In the 1960's he led a group of reform-minded priests in Chicago, and recalled painfully a single year in Cardinal Cody's tenure when no fewer than 45 priests came to tell him about their decisions to leave the priesthood.

A month ago, he circulated for publication a plea for the church to ordain women and married men and give women leading roles in the Vatican.

"Why are we not using to the fullest the gifts and talents of women who constitute the majority of our membership throughout the world?" he wrote. "I realize that even to raise aspects of this question, I label myself a dissenter. Yet prayerful, responsible dissent has always played a role in the church."

Despite his deep identification with Chicago, Monsignor Egan was born in Manhattan, on 134th Street in what was then an Irish section of Harlem. His father, a bus driver, and his mother, a dressmaker, were immigrants from Ireland, and moved to Chicago when John was 6.

He is survived by a sister, Kathleen Egan Martin of Rockford, Ill.

INTRODUCTION OF INTERNATIONAL ENVIRONMENTAL DEFENSE ACT

HON. MARK UDALL

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. UDALL of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the International Environmental Defense Act of 2001.

The purpose of this bill is to clarify the authority of the Secretary of Defense to respond to environmental emergencies. It is cosponsored by my colleague from Colorado, Representative JOEL HEFLEY. I greatly appreciate his support.

In times of natural disaster or other emergencies, the United States for decades has come to the aid of those in need—whether the crisis is the result of an earthquake in Turkey, an erupting volcano in South America, or deadly floods in some other part of the world.

When the need arises, the U.S. government provides humanitarian assistance through the U.S. Agency for International Development, the State Department, the Defense Department, and other federal agencies. It also contracts with private voluntary agencies to provide such assistance and coordinates the U.S. response with that of other countries.

The American military has an outstanding record of participation in these activities. All Americans take pride in the humanitarian assistance provided by the men and women of our armed services.

I strongly support this policy. It is the right thing to do, and in the best interests of our country as well as of people everywhere. Humanitarian assistance is critical to help communities or regions or whole countries recover from devastating natural or man-made events.

But global emergencies come in other forms as well—including environmental emergencies such as oil or chemical spills or other similar occurrences. They may not have the immediate impact on people of homes destroyed in an earthquake or of crops lost to drought. But by polluting waterways, killing fish or other species, or contaminating the air, water, or land, environmental disasters can have devastating effects on the health and well-being of people, wildlife, and ecosystems.

So, wherever they occur, environmental emergencies have the potential to affect the national interests of the United States. And our government—including our military forces—should have the same ability to respond as in the case of other emergencies.

Current law authorizes the Department of Defense to use its funds for the transport of humanitarian relief, allowing U.S. military personnel to help provide foreign countries with emergency assistance such as helicopter transport, temporary water supplies, and road and bridge repair. For example, U.S. military personnel were part of the U.S. response to Hurricane Mitch in Central America and to this year's earthquakes in El Salvador and India.

But when it comes to environmental emergencies, under current law the military now has less ability to help. Those are the situations that are addressed by the bill I am introducing today.

The International Environmental Defense Act would fill a gap in current law so U.S. military transport could be used not only for humanitarian, but also for environmental emergencies. The bill does not require that this be done—but it would authorize the Defense Department to do so, just as current law authorizes but does not require the transport of humanitarian assistance to respond to other emergencies.

As an illustration of the limitations of the current law, consider a recent case about which I have first-hand knowledge.

Earlier this year, as all our colleagues will recall, there was a very serious oil spill in the Pacific Ocean that threatened to contaminate the Galapagos Islands. The government of Ecuador and people everywhere were very concerned that this could imperil the world-famous wildlife of the islands and the rest of that unique ecosystem. They hastened to organize a response.

As part of that response, the Ecuadoran government was in contact with a company in Colorado that makes a product to absorb oil from sea water. But complications arose, and the company contacted my office to see if we could help resolve them.

As we explored the situation, we learned that while the government of Ecuador was interested in acquiring the Colorado company's product, they also wanted to arrange for the United States to transport it to Ecuador by military aircraft, because that would be quicker and cheaper than other alternatives. But when we contacted the Defense Department to see if there was a possibility that it could be arranged, we learned about the limitations of current law. In short, we learned that while military transport might be possible to provide humanitarian relief, that option was not available to respond to an environmental emergency.

The bill I am introducing today would change that—not by requiring the military to provide transport in such a case, but by providing that option in case the U.S. government should decide it would be appropriate.

So, Mr. Speaker, this is not a far-reaching bill. But I think it would provide useful authority for our country to respond to environmental problems that, ultimately, can affect us and the rest of the world.

PAYING TRIBUTE TO RYAN MILLER, RECIPIENT OF THE HOBEY BAKER AWARD

HON. MIKE ROGERS

OF MICHIGAN

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. ROGERS of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I rise to honor the accomplishments of Ryan Miller of East Lansing, Michigan, for being named the top college hockey player in America in 2001. Ryan Miller, a Michigan State University sophomore, received the Hobey Baker Award, only the second time in history a goalie has earned this prestigious honor.

Ryan's brilliant 2001 season included leading the nation in four key statistical categories, the most spectacular being 10 shutouts in 39 games, bringing him to an NCAA career record with 18 shutouts as goalie for the MSU Spartans. Ryan also was named CCHA Defensive Player of the Week five times during the regular season.

Born and raised in East Lansing, the home of MSU, Ryan comes from a hockey family. His grandfather, father, uncle and five cousins all played hockey for the Spartans, and a cousin, Kip Miller, won the Hobey in 1990. In addition to his hockey legacy, Ryan also deserves recognition for his academic achievements both in high school and at MSU.

I urge my colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives to join me in congratulating Mr. Ryan Miller for his achievements, in particular for receiving the Hobey Baker Award. We wish him well in his future endeavors.

TRIBUTE TO MR. TOM SCHEPERS

HON. BETTY McCOLLUM

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Ms. McCOLLUM. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in celebration of the tremendous achievement by a constituent of mine from South St. Paul, Minnesota, Mr. Tom Schepers.

Last November, on Veterans' Day, the Washington, D.C. area welcomed Tom Schepers, as he completed his 5-month, 3,300 mile run in support of the World War II Veterans Memorial. Beginning at Camp Pendleton, California on D-Day, June 6th, 2000, Mr. Schepers covered 25 miles a day, 6 days a week through the Mojave Desert, thin Rocky Mountain air and other extreme conditions. This was no ordinary run. While many Americans would struggle to complete even a single day of such an exhaustive journey, Mr. Schepers completed it while carrying an American flag and a POW/MIA flag on a 10-foot flagpole as well as a 10 lb weight belt, representing the emotional weight borne by the World War II Veterans for over 50 years.

Mr. Schepers heroic story is a tribute to the will and determination of our nation's Veterans. A decorated Vietnam Marine Veteran, earning the Purple Heart and Bronze Star, Mr. Schepers was shot through the leg and foot while saving a fallen comrade. He was not expected to ever walk again, let alone run. But through commitment, sheer determination and pushing himself to his physical limits, he battled back to health. Today, he devotes much of his time assisting ailing Veterans and working to raise awareness to issues of importance for all Veterans. He has logged over 3,500 miles while running for both Vietnam, and Korean War Veterans, in between working as a registered nurse and keeping-up with his three grown children, Melissa, Jennifer and Matthew.

Although Mr. Schepers' story may be news to many, the plight of our World War II Veterans is too frequently forgotten. According to the Veterans of Foreign Wars, of the 16 million Americans that served in World War II, 672,000 were injured and 406,000 died. Each day of freedom we live, we owe to them. Mr. Schepers' tribute to this great American generation is a welcome sight, and one that all Americans must not take for granted.

As the spouse of a Vietnam Veteran, it is both a privilege and an honor to recognize Mr. Schepers for his dedication to our nation's Veterans and for his unwavering commitment to our country. All Veterans deserve our full, undivided respect and admiration for the sacrifices they have made to preserve our freedom. Tom Schepers is a hero for his service as well as for the gratitude he has demonstrated for those who have served our country.

TRIBUTE TO COACHES VS. CANCER FUNDRAISERS JULI AND JIM BOEHEIM

HON. JAMES T. WALSH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, seven years ago, a group of NCAA basketball coaches gathered to create Coaches vs. Cancer, an effort dedicated to reducing the risk of cancer in youth and raising funds to assist in the research, patient services, advocacy, and prevention programs of the American Cancer Society. Since its inception, Coaches vs. Cancer, now a formalized partnership between the National Association of Basketball Coaches and the American Cancer Society, has raised millions of dollars nationally.

In Central New York, Syracuse University Men's Basketball Coach Jim Boeheim began his longtime involvement in the effort during the 1995-1996 season. In its first year of existence, Coach Boeheim's group raised a record for first year programs nationally and finished second in local contribution totals across the country. In its second season, the Syracuse program became the national effort's largest local fundraiser, an honor the Central New York program holds even to this day. Coach Boeheim currently serves as National Chair of the Coaches vs. Cancer Council.

In addition to Coach Boeheim's advocacy and support, the Syracuse chapter owes its success to the work of Juli Boeheim. Since beginning her involvement, Juli Boeheim has chaired numerous fundraising and public awareness events, including creating the Coaches vs. Cancer Basket Ball Black Tie Gala, which has netted over $350,000 over the past two years. Both Jim and Juli Boeheim have traveled regionally and nationally on behalf of the organization and assist in recruiting additional coaches and their spouses to become involved. They have filmed public service announcements, made numerous hospital visits, and attended dozens of public awareness events on behalf of the organization.

Jim and Juli Boeheim's leadership has allowed the Syracuse University Coaches vs. Cancer program to raise close to $2 million for the local programming of the American Cancer Society. As the Home Builders Association of Central New York prepares to honor the Boeheims for their longtime work at its annual Parade of Homes Preview Party on May 31st, it is my privilege to recognize Jim and Juli Boeheim for their leadership—on both a national and local level—within the Coaches vs. Cancer organization.

TRIBUTE TO MR. IRV REFKIN

HON. DUNCAN HUNTER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize a good friend from the San Diego area, Mr. Irv Refkin. Irv will be celebrating his 80th birthday next month and I wanted to take this time to say congratulations.

Irv has lived in Coronado for 20 years and has always been a great supporter of the San Diego community and all its causes. He has never been afraid to speak his mind and when you ask his opinion, you better be prepared to get it.

For five decades, Irv has been involved with the U.S. Navy and several aspects of shipbuilding and repair. Since 1976, Irv has been President of Pacific Defense Systems, a very important ship repair company in National City, California, where he is responsible for all operations. Throughout his service, I can always count on Irv to come up with innovative ideas that help the little guys.

I enjoy working and knowing Irv. He is a world traveler, having just returned from a trip to South Africa, Rome and Madrid, knows how to enjoy fine dining, and is a tremendous asset to the San Diego community. Happy 80th birthday Irv.

HONORING THE 60TH ANNIVERSARY OF ROY AND FERN BARNES

HON. KEN BENTSEN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to congratulate Roy and Fern Barnes of Pasadena, Texas as they celebrate their 60th Wedding Anniversary on June 6, 2001. Roy and Fern have exhibited the finest principles in their service to their community and their family.

Roy Barnes was born in McAlester, Oklahoma, on April 30, 1920. He graduated from Henryetta High School in Henryetta, Oklahoma in 1938. Fern Barnes was born in Hannah, Oklahoma, on January 27, 1922 and was named Ruth Fern Painter. She graduated from Henryetta High School in 1938 and met Roy in 1940.

They eloped in 1941 and were married by a Justice of the Peace in Holdenville, Oklahoma. Roy and Fern later moved to California so Roy could work in a shipyard. He joined the U.S. Army in 1944 to serve his country. After his service in World War II, he sought work in Texas and found it in 1947 at the Shell Chemical Company in Deer Park.

Roy joined the Oil, Chemical, and Atomic Workers International Union in 1948. Actively involved in union affairs, Roy was elected as President of OCAW Local 4-367 in 1963. In 1970, he was elected to the full-time position of Secretary-Treasurer, a position he held for fourteen years, until he retired in 1984. He also served at the national level of the OCAW, as a member of the Executive Board, from 1975 to 1983.

Roy was also active in community affairs, such as serving on the Salvation Army Advisory Board. He was elected to the Harris County Democratic Executive Committee and served as Judge of Precinct 170 for twenty years.

Fern was a full-time homemaker and mother. As her three children grew older, she participated more in local civic activities. She was a volunteer in several hospitals including Southmore, Veterans and Ben Taub for many years. She and Roy have been active in the Golden Acres Civic Club, where Fern has served in every office, including President. Fern was also appointed a member of the Harris County Appraisal District Appeals Board, serving for three years. She was also a member of the Pasadena Independent School District Equalization Board. She was also Assistant Precinct Judge in Precinct 170 for twenty years. She is still active today, currently serving as the Treasurer of the OCAW 4-367 Retirees Club.

Roy and Fern have contributed many efforts to improve our community. They are lifelong Democrats who have always upheld the principles of fairness, honesty and compassion. As part of their legacy, they raised three children who were taught that they have a duty to do that which was right, without concern for whether it was convenient or not. Each of the children became an active member of the community, one as a lawyer, one who became Secretary-Treasurer of OCAW 4-367, following his father's example, and one who taught American Government for 29 years at San Jacinto College.

Throughout 60 years of marriage, Roy and Fern Barnes have exhibited a loving relationship which has been an example of how a good marriage can work for the two people and their community. I want to congratulate Roy and Fern Barnes on this special occasion of celebrating their 60th Wedding Anniversary.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

CONGRATULATING DETROIT AND ITS RESIDENTS ON THE TRICENTENNIAL OF THE CITY'S FOUNDING

SPEECH OF

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

Tuesday, May 22, 2001

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of H. Con. Res. 80, a concurrent resolution congratulating the city of Detroit and its residents on the 300th anniversary of its founding. Detroit has a proud history and has played an important role in the development of the United States. I am pleased that I, and my father before me, have had the opportunity to represent Detroit and the Detroit area for many years.

Detroit was founded in 1701 by French explorer Antoine de La Mothe Cadillac and originally called Ville d'Etoit which means "city of the strait." Detroit is the oldest major city in the Midwest, older than Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago, and Minneapolis.

Most Americans know Detroit as the automobile capital of the world. However, it has a storied past and has done more than just put the world on wheels. Detroit was the last station before Canada on the Underground Railroad. It was also an important battleground in the fight for organized labor and is still home to several unions including the United Auto Workers.

Detroit was named "Arsenal of Democracy" for its contributions to the U.S. war efforts during World Wars I and II. It has played an integral role in developing jazz, rhythm and blues, and the Motown Sound. Additionally, it continues to be an important gateway to Canada.

Throughout its history, Detroit has been the focal point for many other important developments. The mile-long Detroit-Windsor tunnel under the Detroit River was the first automobile traffic tunnel built between two nations. It was in Detroit that Elijah McCoy invented the first practical automatic lubricating cup for trains resulting in the phrase "the real McCoy." You may be interested to know that the "sippy cup," a must have for parents with small children, also was invented in Detroit by Edward Olsen.

Detroit has faced many challenges in its history, from the fire of 1805 that destroyed all but one of its 200 structures to its push to move from an economy dependent on heavy manufacturing to one that is more diverse and focused on the advanced technologies of the future. Detroit has overcome many difficulties and has prospered.

Mr. Speaker, Detroit is the tenth largest U.S. city. It is a metropolis that is vibrant, diverse, and of a world-class caliber. Accordingly, I congratulate its residents on the 300th anniversary of its founding.

INTRODUCTION OF H.R. 1953, THE "RANCHO CORRAL DE TIERRA GGNRA BOUNDARY ADJUSTMENT ACT OF 2001"

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, with the introduction of H.R. 1953, the "Rancho Corral de Tierra Golden Gate National Recreation Area Boundary Adjustment Act of 2001" today we have an incredible opportunity to add over 5,000 acres of pristine natural land to the Golden Gate National Recreation Area (GGNRA), one of our nation's most visited national parks. Furthermore, we have a unique opportunity to do this through a public-private partnership.

The Rancho Corral de Tierra addition to the GGNRA includes one of the largest undeveloped parcels on the San Mateo coast south of San Francisco, and it contains rugged land that is unparalleled in other areas of the park. These lands consist of some of the last undeveloped acreage adjacent to existing parkland in the Bay Area. Permanent protection of these open spaces will protect and preserve unique coastal habitats of threatened, rare and endangered plant and animal species, curb future disruptive development along the coast, and provide important scenic and recreation opportunities for Bay Area residents and visitors to our area.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join me in seizing this unique, exciting and significant opportunity for a public-private-partnership to preserve open space by supporting the adoption of H.R. 1953. Similar legislation is being introduced today in the Senate by Senator DIANNE FEINSTEIN and Senator BARBARA BOXER. The "Rancho Corral de Tierra Golden Gate National Recreation Area Boundary Adjustment Act of 2001" has the support of the entire Bay Area Congressional Delegation. Joining me as co-sponsors of this legislation are my distinguished colleagues ANNA ESHOO, NANCY PELOSI, GEORGE MILLER, LYNN WOOLSEY, ELLEN TAUSCHER, PETE STARK, MIKE THOMPSON, BARBARA LEE, MIKE HONDA, and ZOE LOFGREN.

H.R. 1953 will add three new areas to the GGNRA. These lands are critically situated between existing parkland and would connect national parklands with State parkland and San Mateo County parklands. Adding these lands to park areas in the City of Pacifica would help round out the uneven boundary along the Pacific coast and create a logical and appropriate entrance to the GGNRA for visitors from the south. The lands will also provide important regional trail links between the existing parklands, and would link the congressionally-mandated Bay Area Ridge Trail with the California Coastal Trail. The lands would also provide a wildlife corridor for the diverse array of wildlife that inhabit Montara Mountain.

Mr. Speaker, the largest parcel of land included in this bill is comprised of 4,262 acres, and it is known as the Rancho Corral de Tierra. This parcel shares three miles of boundary with the GGNRA as well as with a California state park and a San Mateo County park. Its relatively untouched upper elevations preserve habitat for several threatened and endangered plant and animal species. This property also contains four important coastal watersheds, which provide riparian corridors for steel head trout, coho salmon and other aquatic species.

When the owner of Rancho Corral de Tierra recently put this property on the market the Peninsula Open Space Trust (POST) negotiated to purchase the property. POST acquired the site for $29.75 million to save the site from development, to preserve this important natural area, and to donate, through private contributions, a substantial amount for the federal acquisition of Rancho Corral de Tierra.

Mr. Speaker, POST is a local land conservancy trust in the San Francisco Bay Area. It has a remarkable track record in working with and assisting the federal government with the protection of other important open space in the Bay Area. In 1994, POST negotiated acquisition of the Phleger Estate in Woodside and its inclusion in the GGNRA. This provided local residents some 1,300 acres of pristine second-growth redwood forest, and the area has become a primary hiking destination in the mid-Peninsula area. I introduced the legislation which added this important parcel to the GGNRA, and I worked closely with my neighbor and colleague, Congresswoman ANNA ESHOO, who took the lead in securing the federal funding of one-half of the purchase price. In this case, POST also provided one half of the purchase price through private donations. POST also assisted the federal government with the protection and acquisition of Bair Island, an important wildlife refuge in San Francisco Bay, which is now managed by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service. Congresswoman ESHOO played a key role in the Bair Island acquisition.

H.R. 1953 will also authorize the National Park Service to include within its boundaries an additional 525 acres of land in the Devil's Slide section of Coastal Highway 1, which is the scenic highway that winds its way along the entire California coast. The Devil's Slide properties are also adjacent to the Rancho Corral de Tierra property. It is my understanding that the California Department of Transportation (Caltrans) will acquire these lands when it builds the Devil's Slide tunnel. This legislation includes the five properties which border the highway alignment that will be abandoned when the tunnel is completed. Since these properties will have no access once the Devil's Slide road is abandoned, Caltrans will purchase these properties from their current owners. It is my understanding that Caltrans will donate these properties to a state park agency for open space use. Caltrans will also relinquish the abandoned Highway 1 alignment to San Mateo County, which will transfer these properties to a park agency after the tunnel is completed.

I want to make something particularly clear, Mr. Speaker. It is not the intention of this legislation to give the federal government any responsibility for the acquisition of land or the construction or completion of the Devil's Slide tunnel. This legislation has nothing to do with the matter of the highway and tunnel construction. This legislation will simply make it possible for Caltrans to donate these properties to the National Park Service when the Devil's Slide tunnel is completed and when the National Park Service has determined the acquisition of these lands is appropriate.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 1953 also includes within the GGNRA boundary the Caltrans-owned Martini Creek-Devil's Slide Bypass right-of-way, which was originally purchased by Caltrans for the purpose of building a highway across Montara Mountain. When San Mateo County voters overwhelmingly decided in a local referendum in favor of the Devil's Slide tunnel rather than the Martini Creek Bypass in 1996, this right-of-way became obsolete. This property, which covers approximately 300 acres, bisects the proposed additions to the GGNRA and will provide important recreation access to the surrounding parklands. It is my understanding that once the GGNRA boundary is adjusted to include this right-of-way, Caltrans will be able to donate this property to the National Park Service.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 1953 will also reauthorize the Golden Gate National Recreation Area and Point Reyes National Seashore Advisory Commission for 20 years. The GGNRA and Point Reyes Advisory Commission was established by Congress in 1972 to provide for the free exchange of ideas between the National Park Service and the public and to facilitate the solicitation of advice from members of the public on problems pertinent to the National Park Service Parks or sites in Marin, San Francisco, and San Mateo Counties. The Advisory Commission holds open and accessible public meetings monthly at which the public has an opportunity to comment on park-related issues.

The Advisory Commission is an invaluable resource for park management. It provides an important forum for the gathering and receipt of public input, public opinion and public comment and allows the park to maintain constructive and informal contacts with both the private sector and other federal, state and local public agencies. The Advisory Commission aids in strengthening the spirit of cooperation between the National Park Service and the public, encourages private cooperation with other public agencies, and assists in developing and ensuring that the park's general management plan is implemented.

As part of its regular monthly hearing process, the Advisory Commission will hold public hearings next month on this legislation in Half Moon Bay, California. Advisory Commission members will be hearing public comment on the boundary study for the "Rancho Corral de Tierra GGNRA Boundary Adjustment Act of 2001" which was produced by Peninsula Open Space Trust in consultation with the National Park Service. All Advisory Commission meetings are open to the public and an official transcript of each meeting is on record and available to the public. The activities and contributions of the Advisory Commission are critical to the efficient operation and management of the two adjoining national park units of Point Reyes National Seashore and the Golden Gate National Recreation Area.

Mr. Speaker, preserving our country's unique natural areas must be one of our highest national priorities, and it is one of my highest priorities as a Member of Congress. We must preserve and protect these areas for our children and grandchildren today or they will be lost forever. Adding these new lands in San Mateo County to the GGNRA will allow us to protect these fragile areas from development or other inappropriate use which would destroy the scenic beauty and natural character of this key part of the Bay Area. I urge my colleagues to take advantage of this unique opportunity to preserve these important lands for addition to our national parks. I ask my colleagues to support passage of H.R. 1953, the "Rancho Corral de Tierra Golden Gate National Recreation Area Boundary Adjustment Act of 2001".

HONORING WORLD WAR II
VETERAN HAROLD EMICK

HON. SCOTT MCINNIS

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. MCINNIS. Mr. Speaker, I am extremely proud to rise today to honor a very special man—World War II Veteran Harold Emick, a resident of Olathe, Colorado. Harold spent three years in the Army, fighting the Germans in Europe. Because of what Harold saw and what he went through in WWII, I would like to thank him for his bravery and courage on behalf of this Congress.

Harold joined the Army in 1943 at the age of 18. In December of 1944 Harold was assigned to the Army's 70th Infantry Division under General Alexander Patch. The 7th Army traveled north through a wintry France. "They Killed us, we killed them. In the end, we won because we killed more of them," Harold said. Harold's first battle was at a farmhouse near Nancy, France. "It was about 3 o'clock in the morning when the German Panzer tank opened up on our sleeping platoon at point-blank range. There was death and chaos everywhere, and when it was finally over, those of us who had survived had gone from green kids in uniform to soldiers."

The 70th Infantry Division fought its way through more death and according to Harold, it grew more personal, as the division lost men to snipers, land mines and armed women and children. In May of 1945 after the Germans had surrendered, Harold's unit was sent back to the States to prepare for the possible invasion of Japan. After the war had ended Harold left the military and attended the University of Tennessee where he received his degree in engineering and business.

Harold spent 38 years with the Burrough Corporation in a number of positions until he retired in 1983. He then moved to the Uncompahgre Plateau about 17 miles outside of Olathe. Harold received the World War II Victory Medal, the American Service Medal, and the European African Middle Eastern Service Medal with bronze stars for the Rhineland, Central Europe and Ardennes campaign. The 70th Infantry Division earned the Presidential Citation with two stars for its valor.

Mr. Speaker, it is with great appreciation that I ask Congress to recognize and honor Harold Emick for all that he did for this country in World War II. Harold was just a boy when he was thrust into battle, but his bravery and the bravery of those who fought and died for this country will forever be etched in our minds.

THE ILSA RENEWAL ACT OF 2001—
H.R. 1954

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to note that earlier today I introduced H.R. 1954, the ILSA Extension Act of 2001, which will extend the provisions of the Iran-Libya Sanctions Act for an additional five years.

I have introduced the bill together with my colleague, the gentleman from California, Mr. HOWARD BERMAN as the lead cosponsor, and with nearly 200 additional original cosponsors.

Among those original cosponsors are members of the House leadership on both sides of the aisle, including, notably, our Majority Leader, DICK ARMEY, DEBORAH PRYCE, CHRIS COX, ROY BLUNT, and Committee Chairmen, PORTER GOSS, SHERRY BOEHLERT, JIM SAXTON, CHRIS SMITH, and DON YOUNG. On the other side of the aisle we have leaders such as MARTIN FROST and BOB MENENDEZ, the Chairman and Vice Chairman of the Democratic Caucus, TOM LANTOS, the ranking Democrat on our House International Relations Committee, and GARY ACKERMAN, the ranking Member on our Middle East Subcommittee.

We are advocating that ILSA remain in effect for another five years because Iran continues to threaten the national security of the United States, as President Bush certified to Congress in March. Although Libyans stand convicted of killing Americans, British, and others by bringing down Pan Am Flight 103, the Libyan government has failed to take responsibility for its actions in this matter, as required by the U.N. Security Council. Without ILSA these countries would be more dangerous still.

It was the intent of the supporters of the Iran-Libya Sanctions Act, five years ago, that either Iran would change its behavior so that it would gain access to investments from around the world or that, absent a change in behavior, it would be hampered in its efforts to promote terror and obtain weapons of mass destruction. It is regrettable that Iranian behavior has not changed for the better.

In fact, it seems to be getting worse—in its training of terrorists, in its production of chemical and biological weapons and the production of long range missiles. But that is no reason to give up our struggle to deprive Iran of the means to use violence to achieve its aims. There is ample evidence that ILSA has delayed exploitation of Iran's energy resources and made their development more difficult and more expensive. And that is exactly what the Iran Libya Sanctions Extension Act will continue to do.

In Iran we are confronted with a regime whose national security aims include the destruction of the State of Israel and a desire to threaten the United States. So it is left to us to do what the Iranian people cannot do for themselves, which is to contain the existing regime as best we can. And that is all that our legislation does.

ILSA does not affect any of our American companies. It is aimed solely at foreign companies which take advantage of our executive-order ban on investment in Iran or Libya.

It even provides that it would not have any further effect if Iran and Libya conform to acceptable standards of behavior for members of the world community. But they have not done so thus far.

Our Subcommittee on the Middle East and South Asia received testimony on May 9 about the impact of ILSA. We believe, based on that testimony and on other information we have received over the years, that ILSA has been effective in slowing down investment in Iran. It has helped to slow Iran's development of the means to threaten the United States and its friends. Iran, however, has been taking actions that threaten the United States. To prevent Iran from doing further harm, we are asking our colleagues in the Congress to renew ILSA.

Mr. Speaker, for the convenience of our colleagues, I am inserting into the RECORD a copy of the bill and a list of its original cosponsors.

H.R. 1954

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "ILSA Extension Act of 2001".

SEC. 2. EXTENSION OF IRAN AND LIBYA SANCTIONS ACT OF 1996.

Section 13(b) of the Iran and Libya Sanctions Act of 1996 (50 U.S.C. 1701 note; Public Law 104-172) is amended by striking "5 years" and inserting "10 years".

HONORING PRISCILLA DONER
REETZ OF BREWSTER, MASSA-CHUSETTS

HON. WILLIAM D. DELAHUNT

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. DELAHUNT. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, May 12, family and friends gathered at the Museum of Natural History on Cape Cod to celebrate the memory of our colleague, Priscilla Reetz.

For 10 years in our Hyannis office—with Representative Studds, then Representative DELAHUNT, she worked each day to help people in need across the cape and islands, with a heart of gold and joyousness to spare. Actress, entrepreneur, novelist, kayaker—Priscilla touched countless lives, including ours, with irresistible zest.

We are deeply saddened by her death, and will miss her dearly. Our thoughts and prayers are with her four children and seven grandchildren.

It is with respect and admiration for this remarkable friend and coworker that I commend to you the obituary for Ms. Reetz that appeared in the Cape Cod Times on Thursday, May 10, 2001:

PRISCILLA DONER REETZ, 72

CASEWORKER FOR REP. STUDDS, DELAHUNT;
STORYTELLER; KAYAKER

BREWSTER.—Priscilla Doner Reetz, 72, a resident of Brewster, died unexpectedly Monday in Brewster.

She was the wife of the late Donald Reetz for 25 years.

Mrs. Reetz was born in Watertown, N.Y., and received an associate's degree from Rochester Institute of Technology. She raised her family in Rochester, N.Y., and in the Finger Lakes region. At age 49, she began a career as a commercial actress in the Boston area.

She moved to Brewster in 1982. She was the proprietor of a small antiques business, and was a fixture behind the counter at the Brewster General Store for many years. She was a storyteller at the Brewster Ladies Library and the Brewster Book Store.

Mrs. Reetz was a caseworker in the Hyannis office of U.S. Rep. Gerry Studs, and later Bill Delahunt, for nearly 10 years.

"Priscilla loved her work because she got so much satisfaction from helping people in need," Delahunt said. "From working with the disabled to those in need of housing, she moved mountains every day for countless Cape Codders."

Mrs. Reetz was very interested in Chinese and American history. She was at work on a collection of poetry for children and a novel at the time of her death.

She was an avid kayaker and loved kayaking on the bays and creeks of the Cape. She also hiked frequently with the Appalachian Mountain Club.

She is survived by three sons, David Reetz of Santa Cruz, Calif., Garin Reetz of Dallas, Texas, and Allan Reetz of Meriden, N.H.; a daughter, Sarah Reetz of New York, N.Y.; and seven grandchildren.

A memorial service will be held at 5:15 p.m. Saturday at the Cape Cod Museum of Natural History, Route 6A, Brewster.

Memorial donations may be made to the Cape Cod Museum of Natural History, Route 6A, Brewster, MA 02631; or to Safe Harbor, c/o Community Action Committee of the Cape and Islands, P.O. Box 954, Hyannis, MA 02601.

IN HONOR OF JOAN RIVERS ON THE OCCASION OF HER BEING NAMED A WOMAN OF THE YEAR
BY THE USO OF METROPOLITAN NEW YORK

HON. CAROLYN B. MALONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mrs. MALONEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Ms. Joan Rivers, a distinguished resident of the 14th Congressional District which I represent and an internationally renowned entertainer, who will be honored by the USO of Metropolitan New York tomorrow at its Women of the Year Luncheon.

The USO is currently in its sixtieth year of existence, dedicated to improving the morale and welfare of our uniformed military personnel. For more than half a century, the USO has been providing a "touch of home" to our men and women in uniform overseas.

The USO Woman of the Year award has been given to an impressive list of past honorees including such luminaries as Barbara Bush, Lady Bird Johnson, and Mamie Eisenhower. One of the greatest entertainers of our time, and a highly successful author and businesswoman, Ms. Rivers is a fitting choice for this distinguished honor.

Joan Rivers is currently acclaimed for her witty and engaging commentary on E! Entertainment Television's Fashion Reviews and E!'s live pre-shows for the Academy Awards. Her signature question, "Can we talk?" has become so well known that the United States government agreed to register it as a federal trademark.

An accomplished comedienne, Ms. Rivers worked her way up through small clubs and lounges, where she often relied on tips in lieu of a salary, to the international celebrity she has reached today. In 1983, "The Tonight Show" with Johnny Carson broke tradition to name Ms. Rivers its sole permanent guest hostess.

A prolific writer, John Rivers has authored nine books, and for three years wrote a thrice-weekly syndicated column for the "Chicago Tribune." Joan Rivers' volumes have been invariably successful; her first book alone sold over four million copies. Ms. Rivers' 1986 autobiography reached number four on the "New York Times" bestseller list in only two weeks. The sequel, Still Talking, published in 1991, was a Book-of-the-Month selection.

Mindful of her incredible success, Joan Rivers has been a role model in her charitable deeds. Ms. Rivers played the voice of the Honest Boy's Mother for an audio version of The Emperor's New Clothes benefiting the Starbright Foundation. In 1982, Ms. Rivers was the first celebrity to call attention to the impending AIDS crisis when she hosted and headlined the first AIDS benefit. Along with many other contributions, Ms. Rivers has also participated in the "Comic Relief" fund-raiser to end homelessness.

I am delighted that the USO has chosen to honor Joan Rivers. I ask my fellow members of Congress to do likewise by joining me in tribute to this truly outstanding woman.

HONORING CAPTAIN KENT
ROMINGER

HON. SCOTT McINNIS

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. McINNIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate Del Norte's Kent V. Rominger for his induction into the Colorado Aviation Hall of Fame at the Air Force Academy in Colorado Springs. The 44-year-old Colorado native is one of those lucky few that has had the privilege of traveling into the final frontier. I would like to thank him for all that he has done for the space program and to congratulate him on his introduction into the Hall of Fame.

Captain Rominger has served in the U.S. Navy since receiving his commission through the Aviation Reserve Officer Candidate Program in 1979. His Naval service included assignments with the Fighter Squadron Two aboard the USS Ranger and the USS Kitty Hawk and Fighter Squadron Two Hundred Eleven aboard the USS Nimitz. Kent is now a NASA Astronaut and Shuttle Commander. He is the first to have commanded two shuttle dockings with the International Space Station Alpha. He holds the record for the most earth orbits and the most time in space.

Kent has traveled into space five times and has logged over 1,500 hours in space. He has piloted the STS-73 in 1995, the STS-80 in 1996 and the STS-85 in 1997 and has served as crew commander twice, on the STS-96 in 1999 and STS-100 this year. His last mission, the STS-100 on the Space Shuttle Endeavour was on April 19. The mission involved installing the Space Stations robotic arm.

Mr. Speaker, Captain Kent Rominger is an American Hero. Many kids grow up dreaming that they will one day be an astronaut, Kent is living that dream. I would like Congress to join me in congratulating Kent on his achievements and wish him good luck on future missions to space.

SPEECH OF

HON. TOM UDALL

OF NEW MEXICO

Tuesday, May 22, 2001

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union had under consideration the bill (H.R. 1) to close the achievement gap with accountability, flexibility, and choice, so that no child is left behind:

Mr. UDALL of New Mexico. Mr. Chairman, Dr. James E. Shanley, President, American Indian Higher Education Consortium, urges us to support an amendment to the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (ESEA).

AMERICAN INDIAN HIGHER EDUCATION CONSORTIUM,
Alexandria, VA, May 16, 2001.

Hon. JOHN A. BOEHNER,
Chairman, Education and the Workforce Committee, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

Hon. GEORGE MILLER,
Ranking Member, Education and the Workforce Committee, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR CHAIRMAN BOEHNER AND RANKING MEMBER MILLER: On behalf of the 32 Tribal Colleges and Universities, I am writing to request your support for an amendment that is being proposed in the Senate to the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (ESEA), S. 1. The amendment addresses a serious matter involving two tribally-controlled postsecondary vocational institutions, United Tribes Technical College (UTTC) and Crownpoint Institute of Technology (CIT).

It is our understanding that the House of Representative's ESEA reauthorization bill has already been reported from your committee, and consequently a similar amendment may not be offered. Therefore, we ask that consideration be given to rectifying this serious issue either through an amendment on the House Floor or during any Conference session that occurs with the Senate on the ESEA reauthorization bill.

CIT and UTTC were founded to provide much needed vocational education opportunities to the American Indian students in their respective tribal communities. Because these two institutions are not eligible to receive funding under the Tribally Controlled College or University Assistance Act and are vocational in nature, Section 117 of the Carl Perkins Act was created in 1990, to offer them a source of core operational support and is key to their existence.

The proposed Senate amendment (numbered 426) reaffirms the original intent of section 117, to provide institutional support for these two tribally controlled vocation institutions. While increased funding for Indian vocational education programs is greatly needed, section 117 is not the appropriate vehicle to address this funding disparity.

AIHEC directly advocated for the creation of section 117 and herein state our intent to do everything possible to continue to protect its original purpose.

Thank you for your attention and consideration of this serious issue. We look forward to working with you on this and other issues that impact our tribal colleges.

Dr. JAMES E. SHANLEY,
President, AIHEC
Board of Directors and Fort Peck Community College, Poplar, MT.

IN HONOR OF CONGRESSMAN
RALPH REGULA

HON. DENNIS J. KUCINICH

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. KUCINICH. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor my distinguished colleague in the Ohio Congressional Delegation, Congressman RALPH REGULA for dedicating more than 45 years in public service.

Congressman REGULA started his distinguished public career early in life as an Ohio State Representative in 1964 and then State Senator. He moved on to serve as a member of the United States House of Representative where he now serves as the Subcommittee Chairman of the House Appropriations Committee.

Before entering public life, Representative REGULA served as a school teacher and principal with Stark County schools and later served on the Ohio Board of Education. Representative REGULA recognizes the value of a good education and continues to support education on the federal level as the chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee for the Departments of Labor, Health and Human Services and Education. He has received many honors for his work in education such as the Stark State College of Technology Founder Award and is a trustee at Mount Union College. He has recently been inducted into the Ohio Federation of Independent Colleges Hall of Excellence.

Representative REGULA has also been dedicated to advocating on behalf of the elderly as Co-Chair of the Older Americans Caucus. In 1994 he was recognized by the Administration on Aging as the first recipient of the Older Americans Month Congressional Award for his work such as extending flu shot coverage under Medicare and authoring legislation to provide coverage for preventative services to the elderly.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Representative REGULA has been a friend and a colleague for many years. I have tremendous respect for him as a legislator. It gives me great pleasure to publicly recognize the achievements of Representative REGULA.

CELEBRATING THE 75TH ANNIVERSARY OF CHARLES H. MILBY HIGH SCHOOL

HON. GENE GREEN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. GREEN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to celebrate the 75th Anniversary of Milby High School. This is a school in East End Houston named after Charles H. Milby who was an important advocate for the creation of the Houston Ship Channel.

Charles H. Milby was born in Indianola, Texas on August 29, 1852, the seventh and youngest child of William P. and Mary Y. Milby. Charles' father was a member of the Texas Congress from 1842 to 1844. Throughout his life, Charles H. Milby was always concerned about improving the economy and welfare of his community. He served as a member of the original committee that presented the U.S. Federal Government with the idea of a deep-water port for Houston. Mr. Milby died on July 1925 and in 1926, Charles H. Milby High School was named in honor of his many contributions to the East End area.

In 1926, Milby High School opened its doors with 212 students and 13 teachers. Today Milby High School has over 3,000 students and is considered the oldest and largest school in the Houston Independent School District. With its proud colors of blue and gold, and its mascot of the fighting buffalo, Milby High School has educated hundreds of alumni veterans who fought in World War II, Vietnam, and the Korean War.

Today, Milby is known for their legendary basketball coach, Boyce Honea, class of 1959. He has been with the school for nearly 25 years, has won many district championships, and 9 victories in the annual 32-team J. C. Tournament. Their school spirit is also evident in their cheerleading squad which participates in yearly competitions and is sponsored by two national cheerleading companies. Most notable, however is Milby's Science and Engineering Magnet Program which attracts many students each year from all over Houston.

Mr. Speaker, in celebration of Milby's 75th Anniversary, there will be a 21-gun salute for the veterans and former students who died in World War II, the Korean War, and the Vietnam War, on June 2 at 1601 Broadway. A 4-foot-by-16-foot granite memorial wall will be donated in their honor by the Milby Anniversary Alumni Association.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to congratulate Milby High School on its 75th Anniversary. I would also ask that my colleagues in the House join me in congratulating the dedicated teachers, administrators, some of whom are alumni, parents and students for 75 years of work and dedication to the East End and our Houston community.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. SANDER M. LEVIN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably absent on Monday and missed rollcall votes No. 126 and 127. Had I been here I would have voted "yea" on both rollcall 126 and 127.

A TRIBUTE TO ALVIN M. PETERSEN: THE INSPIRATION BEHIND CAMPUS MINISTRY AT THE UNIVERSITY OF NEBRASKA

HON. BOB FILNER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. FILNER. Mr. Speaker, today I want to pay tribute to Pastor Alvin M. Petersen and to the legacy he built: the Lutheran Student Center at the University of Nebraska, Lincoln (UNL).

Even though the University of Nebraska is not in my Congressional District and even though it is a long way from California, I want to honor Pastor Petersen, because he is the father of my Senior Legislative Assistant, a woman who has worked on my staff for almost twenty years.

This coming June 9th and 10th, a celebration will be held in Lincoln, Nebraska to commemorate the 50th birthday of the Lutheran Student Center and the work of "Pastor Pete", as he has been called for decades by the university students. Also honored are his wife, Edel, also known as "Mom Pete", who was an integral part of the Center, and the three subsequent pastors: Bruce Berggren, Roger Sasse, and the current pastor, Larry Meyer, who completed his seminary internship serving under Pastor Pete.

The Lutheran Campus Ministry at UNL was begun, with Pastor Pete at the helm, in 1940. Through his diligent efforts, money was raised to build the current building, which opened in 1951, in the center of the UNL campus. In 1958, a chapel was added to the original structure, and Mom Pete lovingly wove banners that still hang over the altar.

The Lutheran Student Center provides worship services, a place for students to belong and to matter in a large university setting, and a training ground for future pastors. The Center has the largest Evangelical Lutheran Church of America (ELCA) worshipping community on any state university campus in the nation.

The Sunday morning worship services and mid-week Vespers are at the heart of the ministry. Bible study, counseling, participation in the choir, fun and fellowship with movie nights, the spring break ski trip, retreats, volleyball and softball are all available to students.

In the past five years, an extensive renovation project was undertaken to bring the building into the 21st century. After $400,000 was raised by Pastor Meyer, the current minister, so that there would be no debt, the Center has been updated, remodeled, and made completely accessible with the addition of an elevator. A new Outreach Program at Southeast Community College in Lincoln has begun, so that students at this community college also feel they are part of a campus ministry program.

The building—the Lutheran Student Center—is the symbol and the physical setting for a ministry that cannot be measured in words. Many a lonesome freshman has found friendships at the Center. Many students with counseling needs, or doubts, or problems have found help at the Center. Many couples have met and married at the Center. Many a faith has been strengthened through worship at the Center.

I am honored to pay tribute to the Lutheran Student Center and to a lifetime of work and love and concern by Pastor Pete—Pastor Alvin Petersen. One person truly can make a difference in this world!

IN HONOR OF REV. FR. DENNIS R.
O'GRADY

HON. DENNIS J. KUCINICH

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. KUCINICH. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to honor Rev. Fr. Dennis R. O'Grady on the 40th Anniversary of his Ordination as Priest, and also on his 20th Anniversary as Pastor of St. Michael's Church in Cleveland, Ohio.

Rev. O'Grady began his distinguished and proud career shortly after his Ordination on May 20, 1961. In June of that same year he became the Assistant at St. Vincent Parish in Akron, Ohio where he spent five years before becoming Assistant at St. Michael's in June of 1966. Rev. O'Grady's honored service to the community continued by becoming a Member of the Diocesan Pastoral Team For the Spanish-speaking and serving in the Hispanic Ministry as Associate Pastor at Blessed Sacrament Parish in Cleveland, Ohio. Throughout his forty years of service, Rev. O'Grady has accomplished great feats within his religion. His tremendous faith and giving nature has brought hope and joy to the lives of thousands.

Mr. Speaker, Rev. O'Grady represents the very best of Cleveland, and his outstanding service to mankind deserves the highest of praise.

I ask my distinguished colleagues to join in rising to celebrate the incredible accomplishments of Rev. O'Grady, and honor his forty years of service to his church, his faith, and the community.

HONORING COUNCILMAN GENE
'IGGY' GARISON

HON. GENE GREEN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. GREEN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor Pasadena City Councilman Gene "Iggy" Garison and to thank him for his distinguished service. Councilman Garison was first elected to the Pasadena City Council in 1993, served as Mayor Pro Tem from 1996 to 1997 and is currently serving his fourth two-year term. He is a dedicated and committed public servant, and his constituents are fortunate to have him as their representative.

Councilman Garison was born in 1942 and has lived in Pasadena for nearly 30 years. Despite recent health problems, he continues to be a driving force in Pasadena. He has touched the lives of so many people and has made numerous civic contributions. As a small gesture of the communities appreciation, the San Jacinto Day Foundation recently decided that the city's annual Strawberry Festival would be dedicated to Iggy Garison.

As a member of the City Council, Garison has been responsible for many improvements in Pasadena. His accomplishments include the revitalization of North Pasadena, the Capitan Theatre and the Corrigan Center. During his tenure, he has worked hard to reduce crime and to improve the city's infrastructure, particularly streets, sidewalks and sewer lines. Councilman Garison has also promoted the demolition of abandoned and deteriorated structures and continues his efforts to reduce flooding.

Iggy Garison has always welcomed opportunities to be of service to his country and his community. He served in the United States Air Force and the Air National Guard. He was a valuable member of the Pasadena Police Department. He was a distinguished volunteer firefighter. And he was an investigator for Constable George Larkin.

Councilman Garison is a member of the Houston Fire Museum board, the San Jacinto Foundation, the American Legion, the Elks Lodge, the National Guard Association, the Harris County Mayor and Council Association, the National League of Cities, the Texas Municipal League, the Association of Federal, State and Municipal Employees Local 1550, and the 100 Club.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the citizens of Pasadena, I would like to thank Gene "Iggy" Garison, as well as his wife, Susie; his son, John, his stepdaughter, Tammy; his stepson, Sam; and his grandson, Tyler for their dedication, service and commitment to the City of Pasadena. I ask my colleagues to join me in honoring this distinguished man.

HONORING THE BAYSIDE JEWISH CENTER'S 75TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to ask all my colleagues to join me in honoring the Bayside Jewish Center on the occasion of its 75th Anniversary.

It was in late 1926 that a small number of Jewish residents in the Bayside West community of Queens, NY, began to meet in a store on 32nd Avenue near 201st Street, made available by Isaac Muss, father of past Honorary President Charles J. Muss. Around the same time, a group of Jewish residents in the central Bayside area rented a loft and began to meet on the third floor above some stores on Bell Boulevard.

During the next seven years, the activities and participation grew steadily. In 1934, Rabbi Ariol Hyams became the spiritual leader of the Bayside West Jewish Center. Because interest had increased substantially, the space available to the members was no longer sufficient. Thus, they joined together with the group at the Center on Bell Boulevard to found and incorporate the Bayside Jewish Center. This was 1935.

It was not until 1960, after many trials and tribulations in respect to finding a permanent place for the center, when the traditional and formal dedication of the new Bayside Jewish Center building was held. Immediately following the dedication of the facility, the Bayside Jewish Center became the main center of community service, a veritable beehive of activity.

Many great personalities have attended meetings and functions at the Center including President Jimmy Carter, Vice President Hubert Humphrey, Senator Jacob Javitz, Senator Wayne Morse, Mayor John Lindsay, Mayor Robert Wagner, numerous Members of the House of Representatives, First Lady Eleanor Roosevelt, Cantor Moshe Kousavitsky and President Norman Lamm of Yeshiva University.

The Center supported many well known causes such as the United Jewish Appeal, Bonds for Israel, Yeshiva University, and other worthy institutions. The Center was the founder of several local organizations as well, such as the Clergy Club of Bayside and the Council of Churches and Synagogues.

One of the great accomplishments of the Bayside Jewish Center was the founding of the Etz Chayim Youth Organization. This organization has brought together over two hundred teenagers to hold their Sabbath Services in the Junior Ballroom of the Center, followed by lunches on each Sabbath or holiday. Etz Chayim can also take credit for weekend Shabbatons, sponsored by Yeshiva University on an annual basis and attended by over three hundred young people from many communities throughout the United States, which have become well-established events. To this day, hundreds of its members are active leaders of many synagogues and Jewish organizations throughout the world.

Mr. Speaker, I ask all my colleagues to join me in honoring the 75th Anniversary of the Bayside Jewish Center and all of the people whose lives it has touched.

HONORING THE LATE COL. JAMES
NEIL HICKOK

HON. SCOTT McINNIS

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. McINNIS. Mr. Speaker, I stand before you today to honor the memory of one of Western Colorado's leading citizens, Colonel James Neil Hickok. James was an active member of the community and was a member of the "Great Generation". He passed away on March 19, 2001 after a long 13-year battle with cancer. Everyone that knew him will truly miss him.

Neil was born in October of 1919 in Chicago Illinois. Neil joined the US Army when he was 16. His first assignment was to protect railroads and missionaries in China. After his tour he returned home to graduate from high school. He received degrees in Military Science from the University of Maryland and degrees in Anthropology and Geology from the University of Colorado. James re-entered the Army at the start of World War II and served in the Pacific Theatre. Neil also served in the Korean War and had three tours of duty in Vietnam.

Neil was a devoted family man. He loved his wife Carol, his son James and daughters Sharron and Dorothy. He also loved his home, which over looks the south fork of the South Platte River. His family said he had a wonderful sense of humor and genuine care for others. Neil served as the chairman of the Park County Republican Party for many years and helped Lake George get their park, library, community center and emergency medical service.

Mr. Speaker, a great friend, father and hero has left us, but his memory will always be with us. I'm asking Congress to pause a moment in remembrance of Col. James Neil Hickok and thank him for all that he has done for his family, community and country.

SCHOOL SAFETY

HON. PETER A. DeFAZIO

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. DeFAZIO. Mr. Speaker, we've spent the day on a very important issue, our children's education. But, the whole picture is not complete. How about the kids who are not prepared for school or are disruptive in class. The kids that, at least, have run-ins with authorities and drop out of school, at most, end up committing violent crimes, sometimes against their own classmates.

The safety of our schools continues to be a major concern as evidenced by a CNN/USA Today/Gallup poll in which 43 percent of parents said they fear for their child's safety at school. One in three parents believes that it is "very likely" that a Columbine-type shooting could happen in their community. While the number of children hurt by violent crime has declined significantly in the last six years, we can't escape the reality of the shootings at Thurston High, Columbine and most recently in Santee, California.

As many of my colleagues know, following the tragic shootings at Thurston High School, I introduced legislation to help combat the growing problem of youth violence in America. The Youth Violence Prevention Package is based on needs identified by my community and is designed to prevent youth from turning to violence by providing adequate crisis intervention and support services.

After a decade of record economic growth and decreasing crime rates, America has the opportunity to invest aggressively in proven violence prevention and youth development activities to ensure that children and families are able to thrive. Targeted investment in prevention efforts that give children and families what they need to stay on track works.

That's why I'm so disappointed by the priorities set by President Bush and Congress in the budget blueprint.

—The Bush budget abandons a commitment made in past budgets to give one million children access to Head Start by fiscal year 2002. Under the Administration's own estimates, the Head Start program will fall 84,000 students short of that goal. The Bush budget actually results in the elimination of Head Start services for 2,500 children.

—In addition, the Bush budget reduces resources for existing Child Care and Development Block Grant projects by $200 million.

Specifically, my legislation would increase the authorization for Head Start programs to $11.5 billion. And, it would create a national child care provider scholarship program to further the goals, of child care provider recruitment, training, credentialing, and retention.

—The Bush budget cuts grants to help states investigate and prevent child abuse and neglect by $16 million—a 47% reduction. Furthermore, most other child welfare service programs are frozen at the fiscal year 2001 level.

—Also, general juvenile justice and delinquency prevention grants are cut by $44 million, gang-free schools and communities grants by $6 million, mentoring grants by $7 million, incentive grants for local delinquency prevention by $25 million and drug reduction grants by $12 million.

On the other hand, legislation I've introduced would increase authorization for Community Based Family Resources and Support Programs, like Relief Nurseries, by $44 million. In addition, it would increase the authorization for Title V incentive grants for local delinquency programs—like, parent assistance, antitruancy, and court schools.

Providing parents with the skills and treatment they need to be better parents is critical. A comprehensive prevention approach that looks at the entire family and identifies the specific needs of the child within that family can reduce the incidence of aggressive and risky behavior that often leads to delinquency. In 1998, there were approximately 1 million confirmed cases of child abuse or neglect. Research indicates that children who experience some form of violence in their homes are more likely to behave violently throughout adolescence and into adulthood. Any comprehensive approach to curb juvenile delinquency and promote positive youth development must consider the impact of domestic violence, abuse, and neglect on a child's development and respond to the interplay between these factors.

—The Bush budget slashes discretionary spending on state and local law enforcement assistance by $1 billion. Specifically, funding of the Edward Byrne Memorial state and local law enforcement program is reduced.

My package includes legislation that would expand discretionary grants under the Edward Byrne Memorial State and Local Law Enforcement Assistance Program by $31 million. Contrary to popular perception, the vast majority of children involved in the juvenile justice system are non-violent offenders. Less than 10 percent of young people who come in contact with the juvenile justice system are serious, habitual, violent offenders. The challenge with all juvenile offenders—both violent and non-violent—is to determine what leads children to make bad choices, to identify those children at high risk for serious delinquent or risky behavior, and to provide appropriate interventions. A 1998 study suggests that the lifetime cost associated with a child who drops out of high school and enters the criminal justice system can reach $1.5 million.

The Bush budget freezes funds for the 21st Century Community Learning Centers after school program at the fiscal year 2002 level.

Furthermore, the Bush budget eliminates a $60 million grant program to the Boys and Girls Clubs of America to operate clubhouses in public housing projects and high-crime areas in cooperation with local police.

My legislation would also expand after school crime prevention programs by providing matching grant funds to private and public programs involved in effective after school juvenile crime prevention. According to the U.S. Census Bureau, nearly 7 million children are left home alone after school each week. It has been well-documented that after school programs help to curb delinquent behavior when it most frequently occurs—between the hours of 3 p.m and 6 p.m. However, these programs do more than just make communities safer, they also help to ensure positive youth development. Youths who participate in after-school and youth development programs are less likely to use drugs, drink alcohol, or become sexually active, and are more likely to have stronger interpersonal skills, higher academic achievement, and healthier relationships with others. Quality after-school programs also have a lasting impact on children's attitudes, values, and skills.

My Youth Violence Prevention Package is designed to prevent youth from turning to violence by supporting prevention efforts, crisis intervention and support services and limiting opportunities for troubled kids to obtain firearms. I ask my colleagues to support this legislative package and to continue efforts to provide needed funds for these critical programs.

We all must work together to protect children and ensure their healthy development.

IN HONOR OF UNITED SERVICE ORGANIZATION

HON. DENNIS J. KUCINICH

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. KUCINICH. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor the United Service Organization for 60 years of service to be celebrated on May 19, 2001 at the USO Military Ball.

The USO, created in 1941 as a merger among six private organizations, began serving to handle the on-leave recreation needs for the members of the Armed Forces. By 1944, USOs were found in over 3,000 locations nationwide. Early on, the entertainment industry supported the USO in beginning the "Camp Shows" with the entertainers waiving pay and working conditions to bring live entertainment to the troops at US bases in America.

After WWII, the USO also provided entertainment for service men and women internationally, opening up service in North Korea, Vietnam and Thailand. During the 1970s, outreach programs increased as did the number of military families worldwide. Since this time, the USO was signed into law as a United States Charter.

Most recently, the USO has provided services in Saudi Arabia, Dubai, Bahrain, Somalia, Bosnia and Hungary. The USO's commitment to be a link to our service men and women continues world wide with the same determination and dedication which first created this organization. My dear colleagues, please join me in celebrating the 60th Anniversary of the United Service Organization.

RECOGNIZING PRESIDENT CHEN SHUI-BIAN'S SUCCESSFUL FIRST YEAR

HON. JOE SCARBOROUGH

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. SCARBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, little more than one year ago, Mr. Chen Shui-bian became the tenth President of the Republic of China. During the first twelve months of President Chen's administration, he sustained the hallmark political and economic reforms that position Taiwan among the most democratic and prosperous places in Asia.

President Chen demonstrated sincerity when seeking meaningful dialogues with his counterparts in the People's Republic of China, and worked hard to maintain peace and stability in the Taiwan Strait. Today, President Chen hopes to improve Taiwan's situation within the global community, and I support his efforts. In the end, his persistence will yield great rewards.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I sincerely congratulate President Chen Shui-bian on a successful first year. As we look forward to an even brighter future, I encourage him to keep up the good work.

HONORING THE NEWARK BOYS CHORUS SCHOOL

HON. DONALD M. PAYNE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, tonight the Kennedy Center will feature as part of its Millennium Stage State Days series a very talented group of students from the Tenth Congressional District of New Jersey whom I was privileged to nominate, the Newark Boys Chorus School. I am so proud of these outstanding young performing artists who have traveled to Washington to share their gift of song at one of America's most prestigious theaters.

Known as Newark's "Finest Ambassadors," The Newark Boys Chorus has been heard throughout the world. The chorus has performed with the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, the American Symphony Orchestra, the Cathedral Symphony and the New Jersey Symphony Orchestra. Locations where they have performed include the Lincoln Center, the New Jersey Performing Arts Center, Carnegie Hall and the White House. With over forty concerts each season, television appearances, tours to Japan, Italy, China, Czechoslovakia, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, the boys have become symbols of Newark's renaissance. The chorus sings for CEOs, Governors and Mayors; they sing in corporate settings, in country clubs and concert halls. They visit museums and libraries, attend plays and symphonies and engage in recreational activities such as skiing, hiking and swimming.

Training for the Chorus School requires hard work and discipline as the boys continue to maintain academic excellence. These outstanding students are sought after by such selective secondary schools as Blair Academy, Peddie, Milton Academy, Pingry School, St. George's, Seton Hall Prep and Science High. The school encourages these students from Newark neighborhoods to reach for the stars. Not only are they outstanding students and performers, they learn to be good citizens with a respect for their community and their environment.

Mr. Speaker, these outstanding youngsters represent the best and brightest of a new generation. Please join me in honoring them as they make their debut at the Kennedy Center.

HONORING THE LATE SGT. CHRISTOPHER RYAN LAIR

HON. SCOTT MCINNIS

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. MCINNIS. Mr. Speaker, on May 18, 2001 Sergeant Christopher Ryan Lair of Parachute, Colorado died before his time. The 22-year-old Marine died in a civilian aircraft near San Diego, California. I stand before Congress to ask that we all pause a moment in honor of Sgt. Lair.

Chris was born in Wheatridge, Colorado in 1979. Chris and his family moved to Parachute, where he graduated from Grand Valley High School in 1997. After graduation, he enlisted in the U.S. Marine Corps. He was stationed at Camp Pendleton, California, where he was Crew Chief in VMLA-169, a Huey/Cobra helicopter squadron.

On May 1, 2001, Chris was promoted to the rank of Sergeant. During his enlistment, Chris had been awarded the Good Conduct Medal, the Humanitarian Service Medal, the Sea Service Deployment Medal, and the Navy Achievement Medal.

Flying was his greatest joy. He grew up around airports as his parents owned and operated an avionics shop at Garfield County Airport. He received his pilot's license at the age of 18 and completed his multi-engine certificate in May 2001. He flew every opportunity he had and his goal was to become a commercial pilot after serving in the military.

Mr. Speaker, Sgt. Christopher Lair was truly one of our 'few good men'. It's a tragedy that he died so young and at something he loved to do. I ask that Congress pause a moment to honor him and thank him for his service to our country.

IN HONOR OF THE SISTERS SERVANTS OF MARY IMMACULATE

HON. DENNIS J. KUCINICH

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. KUCINICH. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor The Sisters Servants of Mary Immaculate on the 25th anniversary of its Ministry to the Aged in the Diocese of Cleveland on this 26th day of May.

Though the Sisters Servants of Mary Immaculate came to Cleveland in 1976, they were founded over 100 years ago in Poland. The Sisters were founded on the principles of apostolic works and have given their time selflessly to the sick, aged, forgotten, and lonely. Their ministry eventually expanded to the United States, and a headquarters was built in Maryland where the Sisters established and managed a home for the sick and elderly.

After arrival in Cleveland, the Sisters quickly clarified their purpose and mission: to minister to the spiritual needs of the elderly of the Polish families and their corporal needs as far as possible; and to educate the families and the community to understand the needs of the elderly and to recognize their respective responsibilities to the elderly.

The Sisters have done just that and so much more. The Sisters current work is their Special Ministry to the Aged under the auspices of Catholic Charities. This ministry provides and arranges for basic human needs such as food, shelter, health care, and social services. The ministry is staffed by five sisters with professional backgrounds in nursing, social work, and occupational therapy, 24 hours a day. The Sisters have also developed a "Phone Companion Reassurance Program" where volunteers are trained and connected to homebound elderly who have little or no family support.

The Sisters have served Cleveland selflessly and are an incredible asset to the entire community. They have come to serve and be a presence to many poor and frail elderly. Please join me in honoring the Sisters Servants of Mary Immaculate on this very special occasion.

HONORING A MAN OF GREAT ABILITY JAMES E. HAUN—AN EXEMPLARY LIFE AND MAN

HON. ZACH WAMP

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. WAMP. Mr. Speaker, I rise to talk about an exceptional man in my district, James E. Haun. Jim has served as an electrician for 40 years, with unwavering dedication. Throughout his outstanding career, Jim has demonstrated remarkable ability not only to perform the duties of an electrician but also to motivate others to reach their potential, winning the unbridled respect and admiration of his peers and superiors. He was born in Harriman, Tennessee on November 16, 1935 and moved his family to Oak Ridge, Tennessee where he graduated from the Oak Ridge High School in 1955. He enlisted in the United States Air Force following graduation and served four years as a jet engine technician. He also served a tour of duty in French Morocco.

Following his discharge, Jim decided to enter the electrical field. Terrell Electric hired him in September of 1959, as an Electrician's Helper. Jim became a member of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (IBEW) Local 175 located in my district. He served a five-year apprenticeship and graduated as an Inside Wireman in 1966. Because of his outstanding abilities, he was offered a position as a 2nd Year Instructor with the Apprenticeship School and he remained in that position until he accepted the position of School Training Director in 1992. Jim has served Local 175 in many capacities including the title of Treasurer from January 1992 to October 1992 and held membership on the I.B.E.W. Credit Union Committee.

Jim's dedication to his family, country, community and his profession is exemplary of the type of character and spirit he possesses. He is truly a remarkable man. I am very honored to represent Jim Haun in the Third Congressional District of Tennessee.

Mr. Speaker, I am honoring Jim Haun today in honor of his retirement from a full life well lived. On behalf of a very proud district, I extend to him my very best wishes for continued success in his future endeavors.

HONORING THE ARNOLD ENGINEERING DEVELOPMENT CENTER ON THE OCCASION OF ITS 50TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. VAN HILLEARY

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. HILLEARY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in honor of the United States Air Force's Arnold Engineering Development Center at Arnold Air Force Base, Tennessee, which celebrates its 50th Anniversary on June 25, 2001.

The test center is named after 5-star General Henry 'Hap' Arnold, World War II commander of the Army Air Corps, and the father of the United States Air Force. In 1944, General Arnold asked Dr. Theodore von Karman to form a scientific advisory group to chart a long-range research and development program for the Air Force. After World War II, members of this group visited Germany to view its research and development facilities. They were disturbed to find that the German scientists were years ahead of the United States in the development of aerospace technology. Fortunately for us, Germany had made these technological advances too late in the war, and had to surrender before it could take full advantage of them. Even today, it is chilling to think what might have happened if the Axis powers had been able to hold out just a little longer.

General Arnold knew that America was unlikely to be that fortunate again, and determined that in order to keep America's Air Force prepared to fight and win our nation's wars, we needed a first class flight simulation test facility. In 1949, Congress authorized $100 million for the construction of such a facility at the Army's old Camp Forrest between Tullahoma and Manchester, Tennessee. On June 25, 1951, President Harry S. Truman himself dedicated AEDC, declaring that, "Never again will the United States ride the coat tails of other countries in the progress and development of the aeronautical art."

tion test facilities has made good on that promise. AEDC's wind tunnels, jet and rocket altitude test cells, space chambers and ballistic ranges have played a vital role in the development and sustainment of every American high performance aircraft, missile and space system in use today. Twenty-seven of the center's 58 test facilities are unique in the United States. Fourteen can be found nowhere else in the world. But what makes AEDC special can't be measured simply in nuts and bolts. It also lies in the unsurpassed quality of the engineers, scientists, technicians, craftsmen and support personnel who work there.

Thanks in part to the tireless efforts of these dedicated men and women, the Cold War that President Truman and General Arnold prepared for has been won. But now, America faces an uncertain world of emerging threats, requiring the development of an advanced American space and missile defense, and a new generation of manned and unmanned aircraft. As it has since its inception, AEDC will lead the way in the U.S. Air Force's efforts to protect American liberty by remaining the world's preeminent aerospace power.

I salute the hard work of the men and women of AEDC, both past and present, and look forward to AEDC's next 50 years as America's premier flight simulation test facility.

TRIBUTE TO CHARLES FRANCIS FITE

HON. JOHN T. DOOLITTLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, today I wish to recognize and honor the life of Mr. Charles Francis Fite of Fair Oaks, California. I was blessed to have known Charlie for a number of years, and am truly grateful to have counted him a friend. Charlie Fite passed away on May 10, 2001, at the age of 89—leaving behind his loving wife of nearly 70 years, Hazel, two children, five grandchildren, and eleven great-grandchildren.

Born in Paris, Arkansas, Charles Fite's life is a shining example of the American dream. As a young man, Mr. Fite toiled in the coalmines of northwestern Arkansas and contributed to the war effort as a master electrician in the naval shipyards of Long Beach. Later, Mr. Fite immersed himself in the world of finance and banking. Mr. Fite was instrumental in the founding of the world's first fast food franchise, Dairy Queen, where he served as president.

After retiring from Dairy Queen, he and Hazel moved to the Sacramento area in 1969. In 1970, he and his son Bruce entered into real estate development along with grandson, Chet Fite. In 1980, he founded HCF, Inc., and continued real estate development with his daughter, Barbara, and grandson, Greg Hardcastle.

Charlie's work has left an indelible mark on the Sacramento area and has been instrumental in the region's development and positive growth. The business enterprises and projects for which Charlie is responsible are too numerous to name, but one of his more recognizable projects is the Sacramento Sportsplex on Highway 50.

Charlie Fite's accomplishments are many and great, but his life could never be defined by business acumen alone. Instead, Charlie will be remembered most for his honesty, integrity, and generosity. He will be revered and honored not for what he made for himself but for what he selflessly gave to others. Charles Fite was not simply a boss, he was a mentor; he was not just a father, he was a dad. His motto always was, "It's not a good deal unless it's a good deal for everybody." Charlie was a man of great inspiration, and he had an innate ability to lift those up who were around him.

Charles was also a man of deep Christian faith. He helped found Warehouse Christian Ministries and served on the board of Capital Christian Center. Charlie Fite both professed and lived his Christian faith. He was a compassionate and a wise friend whose life will be cherished and remembered by generations yet unborn. He will be profoundly missed, but he certainly will not be forgotten.

May you rest in peace, Charlie.

HISTORY OF THE WEST PALM BEACH VETERANS ADMINISTRATION MEDICAL CENTER

HON. JOHN L. MICA

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, the West Palm Beach Department of Veterans Affairs Medical Center in Florida was inspired by the life, military service and death of Pfc. John Mica. Army Corpsman Mica was born on April 3, 1915 in Binghamton, NY, served as a private in the U.S. Army from 1943-44, and died July 16, 1972 in a crowded veterans hospital in Miami, Florida.

Because of the circumstances of John Mica's death in that veterans facility, which was strained to capacity, his son Daniel A. Mica made construction of a new South Florida veterans hospital one of his goals when elected to the U.S. Congress. From 1978 to 1988, Congressman Daniel Mica, a member of the House Veterans Committee, cited the need for additional veterans medical facilities in Florida at every meeting of that Congressional panel over the decade of his service.

Congressman Daniel Mica, on February 8, 1983 during the 98th Congress, introduced H.R. 1348, "A bill to construct a new Veterans Administration hospital in the State of Florida." Construction of the Palm Beach County Veterans' Hospital was completed in 1994.

This history has been submitted into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by Congressman JOHN L. MICA in memory of his father, Pfc. John Mica, and also in recognition of his brother Daniel's contribution to the veterans of the State of Florida.

MINI OLYMPICS A CREDIT TO MOUNT CARMEL AREA

HON. PAUL E. KANJORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Mr. KANJORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the participants and volunteers in the Mount Carmel Mini Olympics for People with Special Needs, which has grown in each of its seven years. This year's Mini Olympics will be held on June 2.

Last year, I had the opportunity to witness first-hand the dedication of the athletes and the generosity of the many volunteers who make this event possible.

A group of friends initiated the Mini Olympics to allow local special needs athletes the opportunity to participate that might not otherwise be possible due to the travel distance, lodging expenses and commitment of time that are sometimes necessary for the state or national Special Olympics. Building on that success, the Mini Olympics have become an annual event. The number of participants has grown from 44 at the beginning to 184 last year.

Led by Chairman Ron Tanney, the Mount Carmel Mini Olympics for People with Special Needs Committee organizes this inspiring event with the help of many volunteers and community donors too numerous to list them all here.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to call to the attention of the House of Representatives this extraordinary event and the people who make the Mini Olympics possible, and I wish them all the best as they continue with their many endeavors.

I would now like to insert for the record an editorial from the Shamokin News-Item commending the volunteers and participants in last year's Mini-Olympics, words which I am sure will apply equally well this year.

TWO 'CLASS' EVENTS THAT MAKE US PROUD
[Shamokin News-Item Editorial, June 6, 2000]

Two annual events, both held this past weekend, show the class of area volunteers and the generosity of our area's residents.

The two events, of course, are the Mount Carmel Mini-Olympics for People with Special Needs and the Relay for Life sponsored by the American Cancer Society.

Seldom do we witness the level of unselfishness and the concern for fellow human beings that is so apparent at these two programs.

This was the sixth annual Mini-Olympics and the program keeps getting better every year. Thanks to a cadre of dedicated volunteers who plan the day out of love, those who help out at the events and the generous businesses, individuals, organizations and government officials who support it, the Mini-Olympics is a high point in the lives of the participants and their families. Indeed, the lives of all who are in the stadium are enriched because of the Mini-Olympics. It is truly a celebration of life.

So too is the annual Relay for Life, in which people throughout the region join forces to fight a terrible killer and give moral support to those who fought their own personal fights and to the families of those whose personal battles are over. The camaraderie and unity of purpose exhibited by Relay teams should serve as an inspiration for those of us who make the mistake of trying to "go it alone" in tough times.

When cynics claim that this area is "dying," we need only point to the Mini-Olympics and the Relay for Life, events which affirm our love for life and our commitment to each other. These are events that should make us proud to be residents of the Shamokin-Mount Carmel area.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Thursday, May 24, 2001

The House met at 10 a.m.

The Chaplain, the Reverend Daniel P. Coughlin, offered the following prayer:

Lord God, You glory in Your people even more than the artisan or craftsman delights in the work of their hands. More than a parent takes joy in the graduation of a son or daughter, do You glory in us as Your children.

May we in turn prove worthy of Your love and attention by listening and caring for one another and the generation to come. May this House and this Nation prove truly responsive to present needs and responsible for future results. Guide us by the spirit of freedom so that we may prove to be Your model for other nations.

We call out to the world to rejoice with us and to learn from us.

O praise the Lord, all you nations; acclaim Him, all you peoples. Strong is His love for us; He is faithful forever. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

Mr. McNULTY. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to clause 1, rule I, I demand a vote on agreeing to the Speaker's approval of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Speaker's approval of the Journal.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. McNULTY. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to clause 8, rule XX, further proceedings on this question will be postponed.

The point of no quorum is considered withdrawn.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from North Dakota (Mr. POMEROY) come forward and lead the House in the Pledge of Allegiance.

Mr. POMEROY led the Pledge of Allegiance as follows:

I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

CONGRATULATIONS TO ELLEN KEMPLER ON HER SELECTION FOR INDUCTION INTO NATIONAL TEACHERS HALL OF FAME

(Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to congratulate Ms. Ellen Kempler, a teacher at MAST Academy in my congressional district, who was one of five exceptional educators recently inducted into the 2001 National Teachers Hall of Fame.

As a former teacher, I know that no reward is greater than impacting the lives of students.

It is evident that Ms. Kempler has been an inspiration to her students. As one student stated, she has the gift of finding talent and academic strength in every student and inspires them to express it in a positive way.

Ms. Kempler, presently a 9th grade English and a 12th grade ethics and leadership teacher, is committed to excellence in education. She states, "Life is a huge relay race. I am alive and carrying the baton now. The future depends on me as surely as my generation depended on our teachers and their teachers and their teachers."

Ms. Kempler is an exemplary educator and a role model whom her students should hope to emulate. I ask that my congressional colleagues join me in commending Ms. Ellen Kempler for her success and for having been selected for induction into the National Teachers Hall of Fame.

A COMMITMENT TO ONE PERSON, ONE VOTE

(Mr. CUMMINGS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, some people believe election reform is a dead issue, but I stand here today to state that it is alive and I have taken the first step. I have taken the first step in recognizing that during the 2000 presidential election, the principle of one person, one vote was abandoned, resulting in the disenfranchisement of thousands of citizens. I have taken a first step in recognizing that our current doctrines and laws, namely our Constitution and the Voting Rights Act, provide guarantees against many of the discriminatory violations that occurred during the election. I have taken the first step, Mr. Speaker, by introducing a resolution, H. Res. 139, which confirms this body's commitment to these doctrines and calls for their vigorous enforcement.

What better way to restore the American people's faith in government and the principle of one person, one vote than to confirm our commitment to our current laws as a foundation to election reform. This is the first step.

I urge my colleagues to take the first step with me. Cosponsor H. Res. 139 and confirm their commitment to the principle of one person, one vote.

MEMORIAL DAY MEMORIAL

(Mr. GIBBONS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, this week we will be returning back to our home districts for the Memorial Day District Work Period. Today I wanted to take this opportunity to thank those men and women for whom we celebrate Memorial Day every year. Most other national holidays would have no meaning if it were not for the sacrifices we honor on Memorial Day. This day of recognition represents why so many sons and daughters of our land and other lands have dreamed of being Americans. No other nation has sacrificed so much to secure not only its freedom but that of other nations.

We honor those who made the ultimate sacrifice for freedom, not only out of respect and gratitude but because heroes will always be needed and treasured. Younger generations need to know the price our heroes have paid, and the souls of those who have paid that price need to know it was not made in vain.

Mr. Speaker, I proudly salute our heroes.

OUR TRADE PROGRAM BEARS THE LABEL, MADE IN CHINA

(Mr. TRAFICANT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, China is now taking $100 billion in trade surplus from America. Even our trade program bears the label, made in China. What is even worse, China considers America the enemy and China actually held Americans hostage. Now if that is not enough to scare Freddy Krueger, recent reports say China illegally bought U.S. microchips to build new missiles and to aim them at the United States of America.

Mr. Speaker, beam me up. The American taxpayers are funding World War III, so help me God.

I yield back the fact that the nature of a dragon is not to negotiate with its prey. The nature of a dragon is to kill its prey.

FEDERAL EMPLOYEES WHO USE WORK COMPUTERS TO VISIT SEX SITES, GAMBLE, TRADE STOCKS AND VISIT CHAT ROOMS ARE UNDERWORKED, OVERPAID AND SHOULD BE FIRED

(Mr. DUNCAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago a front page story in the Washington Times reported that IRS employees used about half their on-line time at work to visit sex sites, gamble, trade stocks and visit chat rooms. I know that people say it is dangerous to criticize the IRS, but this is ridiculous.

This article by the Scripps Howard News Service did not come from some enemy of the IRS. This report came from the office of the IRS's own inspector general. No wonder we read that almost half the advice the IRS itself gives out is wrong.

There is no good reason why our Federal Tax Code should be nearly as complicated, convoluted and confusing as it is. For years, liberal elitists have cried, take the politics out of everything, and the people have lost control over their own government.

Federal bureaucrats know they can get away with almost anything, but Federal employees who use work computers to visit sex sites, gamble, trade stocks and visit chat rooms are underworked, overpaid and should be fired.

CALIFORNIA ENERGY CRISIS

(Ms. WOOLSEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Ms. WOOLSEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise this morning in outrage, outrage that the White House is working on a tax cut for the wealthiest people in this Nation, while my constituents in Marin and Sonoma Counties in California are still dealing with rolling blackouts and skyrocketing energy bills; while the greedy power companies are raking in record profits.

The White House can and must take action and they must protect California consumers from runaway prices, but despite repeated and urgent requests from the Democratic California delegation, President Bush refuses to order FERC to impose wholesale cost-based rates in California and the western region.

With two oilmen in the White House, it is no surprise that this administration has not turned their back in the direction of the consumer, has instead turned their back on the consumer by siding with the oil special interests.

This is not acceptable. It sets a precedent nationwide and not only threatens California's economy but also threatens our Nation's economy.

MEMORIAL DAY TRIBUTE TO MEN AND WOMEN IN U.S. ARMED FORCES

(Mrs. JO ANN DAVIS of Virginia asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. JO ANN DAVIS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in observance of the upcoming Memorial Day holiday to pay tribute to the men and women of the U.S. armed services. For the past 226 years, our military forces have repeatedly answered the Nation's call to protect the freedom we all cherish today.

During our Nation's formative years, brave Americans fought to win freedom for all. World Wars I and II, Korea, Vietnam and the Persian Gulf saw new generations of dedicated men and women fight to preserve the hard-earned freedom for our Nation and our allies abroad. Today Americans around the world enjoy the security that comes from knowing their freedom is protected by those currently serving in the U.S. Armed Forces.

Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I stand and recognize the honor, courage and commitment that has defined the men and women of our Nation's Armed Forces and to thank those who sacrificed their lives to ensure that future generations may enjoy the blessings of freedom.

WE NOW KNOW WHO IS IN CONTROL HERE IN WASHINGTON

(Mr. INSLEE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. INSLEE. Mr. Speaker, we now know who is in control here in Washington, D.C. In the House, the Republicans are in control. In the Senate, the Democrats are in control. In the White House, the oil and gas industry is in control.

The fact that this line came from a famous talk show host does not mean it is any less true because while wholesale electrical rates from the energy industry have gone up 500 to 1,000 percent on the west coast, while my constituents' energy costs have doubled, this White House has done nothing, absolutely nothing, to help the energy crisis in the short-term in the Western United States.

This White House should listen to the people they ought to be working for, the people whose hard-earned money is going to these energy costs. I will say, every single dollar any American may get from this tax cut in the next 2 years, I will say exactly where it is going, it is going to the energy costs and enormous spikes in these costs that this White House is doing nothing about.

We call on this President to adopt a cost-based system. We call on this President to not sit on his hands. We call on him to do something with FERC.

H.R. 1954, THE ILSA EXTENSION ACT OF 2001

(Mr. GILMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday along with 200 of my congressional colleagues, I introduced H.R. 1954, the ILSA Extension Act of 2001, which extends the provisions of the Iran-Libya Sanctions Act for an additional 5 years.

This measure is aimed at dissuading foreign companies from investing in Iran and Libya and does not affect any of our American companies. In Iran, we are confronted with a regime which continues to threaten the national security of the United States and the destruction of Israel. The Libyan government has failed to take responsibility for its actions in a terrorist attack in bringing down Pan Am Flight 103, killing Americans, British and others. ILSA has been effective in slowing down any investment in Iran and in Libya. The ILSA Extension Act will enable our Nation to continue our efforts to pressure Iran and Libya to conform to acceptable standards of behavior within the international community. I invite our colleagues to join us in this important issue.

REAL TAX RELIEF IS NEEDED

(Mr. POMEROY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. POMEROY. Mr. Speaker, House and Senate conferees are grinding away on a massive budget reconciliation act, rushing to try and complete business before we leave for the Memorial Day recess.

I believe there are three questions we can appropriately raise about the tax relief proposed in this act. Is it fair? Is it timely? Does it allow for other priorities?

First, is it fair? In the Senate version, the top 1 percent of wage earners in this country get 35 percent of the relief. The top 10 percent, most affluent 10 percent, get half, 54 percent, of the relief. The lowest paid 40 percent of us in this country get 7 percent under this tax bill. The bottom 20 percent get a single percent of the relief.

Is it timely? It is not phased in for years. The phase-in on the marriage penalty relief does not even begin until 4 years from now. That is not marriage penalty relief, that is a distant anniversary present, much less than is represented in the tax bill.

Finally, is there room for other priorities? There is not a dollar of additional defense spending as soon to be recommended by the Secretary of Defense contained in this budget. It raises the prospect that we will be raiding the trust funds, and the tax bill should be defeated.

ENERGY CRISIS IN CALIFORNIA

(Mr. CUNNINGHAM asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, my colleagues on the other side spoke about the California energy problem. There is a desperate problem in California and all over the West Coast.

However, I want to tell my colleagues, special interests have kept us from building power plants in the State of California for over 20 years. While our population growth has increased, our ability to produce our own power has reduced. They have stopped nuclear power, they have stopped new generating power, and now we are facing the biggest crisis in decades. At a time when most of our power generators in California were forced to be outside the State because of these special interest groups, Governor Gray Davis, exercised no responsibility for the newly deregulated energy market place, and that put us in the situation we are in right now, especially for San Diego, because San Diego Gas & Electric is a private industry and cannot buy inexpensive public power.

There were two natural gas power generators, two different types, built to be environmentally safe. The President offered to help Gray Davis obtain these generators. Gov. Davis said, we do not need them. Another company upgraded its energy plant and went to get the operating license from Gray Davis, our governor said, if you unionize this plant, I will give you your license.

The biggest problem we face in California is the governor of California, he has failed us in his handling of this energy crisis.

CALIFORNIA NEEDS IMMEDIATE RELIEF FROM ENERGY COSTS

(Ms. SOLIS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Ms. SOLIS. Mr. Speaker, as a representative from the great State of California, I have to tell my colleagues that my constituents are angry. We have had to sit through blackouts; we have had to see the increase in our gasoline prices, and a loaf of bread, by the way, has gone up as well. People are suffering. They are crying out for this government, for FERC to do something, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission. We are waiting for their action. We are not seeing anything.

Last year, California had to pay $30 per megawatt hour. This time, it is almost $2,000 an hour. People in my district whose average income is about $31,000 cannot afford to live through this summer. We need immediate action; we need relief. We do not want to see drilling. We want to see clean water, we want to see our energy restored. We do not have a problem with the supply, as was stated earlier by my colleague. What we see here in California is the very fact that energy producers from out of State, from Texas, who are now making these policy decisions on energy, are the ones that are robbing our consumers in California.

I ask for my colleagues to vote down this proposal on energy and also this infamous tax cut that will not benefit the residents in my district.

SAY NO TO BIG OIL

(Ms. DELAURO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Ms. DELAURO. Mr. Speaker, America's families are struggling with high energy costs, but the Bush administration is more interested in catering to the needs of big oil and energy companies, rather than helping the working- and middle-class families that need their relief now.

We need long-term solutions that encourage exploration, increase refining capacity, and help Americans conserve energy. But, in the short term, we need to aggressively protect consumers, investigate price fixing, and consider releasing oil from the Strategic Petroleum Reserve to moderate the effects of price spikes. The administration has rejected these options out of hand.

What is their solution? What does the President say? Drill in the Arctic National Reserve and relax clean water and air standards.

Last week, the President suggested that his tax cut will solve the energy crisis, a bizarre and a disconnected idea. That hard-earned refund, my friends, should not go into the pockets of the energy executives who are already making outrageous profits at the expense of hard-pressed American families.

I call on the President to say "no" to his big oil and big energy friends. Say "yes" to America's families that need help with rising gas and energy prices.

POLITICS AND THE ENERGY CRISIS

(Mr. BALDACCI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BALDACCI. Mr. Speaker, a short while ago Senator JIM JEFFORDS announced he was changing his registration to be an Independent and not be a Republican anymore and, in that statement, he also talked about the differences of opinion he has with the administration in regards to energy and the environment.

I first want to say how pleased I am with Senator JEFFORDS' decision and how well regarded he is as someone who is very thoughtful and fair and very much a public servant, and with the public interests in mind. We in New England appreciate that.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LAHOOD). The Chair would remind all Members that debate in the House may not include personal references to Senators. The gentleman may proceed.

Mr. BALDACCI. Mr. Speaker, we recognize that the interest of the public have not been represented.

If we look at this proposal that has been put forward by the administration where it talks about just the supply, it talks about drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. Had this Congress and the leadership in this House not earmarked out raising the fuel efficiency standards, we would not need to be doing that drilling, because we would be getting twice as much oil out of the fuel efficiency and out of the savings we would have gotten from conservation. This administration has eliminated the scientific research and development so that we could be able to better generate more energy efficiency, both in our automobiles and vehicles and in our manufacturing and small businesses.

We must reject this. It represents the special interests and not the public interest, and many public servants throughout this country are signing on.

TAX CUT EATS UP ENERGY COSTS

(Mr. BACA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BACA. Mr. Speaker, President Bush and Vice President CHENEY have turned their backs on the people of California. What we need them to do is to step up to the plate and swing the bat.

Millions are suffering because of their indifference, their protection of oil big businesses versus the people of California. We need to protect our consumers. Instead of making out-of-State generators play fair, they are letting them lead America.

We are hemorrhaging. Our seniors should not have to choose between electricity and food. Our schools and factories should not have to suffer or close their doors.

This is about children in San Bernardino crosswalks. This is about protecting jobs, having the lights turned on. This is about working families. This is about individuals who are suffering because President Bush has failed to take on the responsibilities.

It was said earlier that it was Governor Gray Davis. No, deregulation was started by Pete Wilson who actually had the State of California deregulate. We are suffering because the Republican Party thought there would be enough energy. We do not have the energy. We need the President to step up to the plate. A tax cut will not make up for the skyrocketing bills. Let us put on a price cap.

FUTURE HOLDS EXPLODING EXPENDITURES AND DEFICITS

(Mr. HOYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, in 1981, we ushered in a decade of profligate spending and exploding deficits. In 1990, we passed a budget bill that was tough and it helped bring down those deficits and bring us a surplus. In 1993, we took another action which was tough and helped bring down those deficits and create the surpluses. In 1997, in a bipartisan way, we passed a bill that was tough and helped bring down deficits and create surpluses. We now wait on a conference report that will again, as we did 20 years ago, usher in a decade of exploding expenditures and exploding deficits. That is irresponsible.

We passed a personal bankruptcy bill that said we expected each citizen of America to be personally responsible. Mr. Speaker, it is equally important that we be collectively responsible and reject this bad policy for America.

PRESIDENT BUSH SHOULD STOP SUPPORTING BIG OIL AND SUPPORT THE AMERICAN PEOPLE

(Mr. DEFAZIO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DEFAZIO. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, hand-picked by President George Bush, Mr. Hebert, has chosen to turn a blind eye toward the price gouging and market manipulation which is enriching a few huge energy companies, several of which happen to be based in Houston, Texas, at the expense of tens of millions of people in the Western United States.

It is not only Californians who are suffering. We are paying a higher average price in the wholesale market in Oregon and Washington than they are in California, and it is not necessary. It is manipulated.

Let us look at one company, Reliant Power. Profits up by 1,800 percent in one year. Is that not grand, from $27 million to $482 million. But on Sunday, the San Francisco Chronicle revealed that they are blatantly manipulating the market. They have phone lines between their traders and their trade rooms and their plant operators in California, and when the price of energy drops, they shut the plants off and turn the lights out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DEFAZIO. And then when the price skyrockets, they turn them back on. They are destroying the plants, they are destroying the economy, and the Bush administration and their hand-picked chair of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission are refusing to take the actions required under the law to stop unjust and unreasonable price gouging and market manipulation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DEFAZIO. It is past time for the Bush administration to stop supporting the energy companies and support the American people.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would appreciate it if the Members would abide by the 1-minute time limit.

FERC MUST INSTITUTE PRICE CAPS

(Ms. LEE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Ms. LEE. Mr. Speaker, at a time when my home State of California and more and more States in this country are dealing with the most severe energy crisis in the past several decades, I believe it is really the height of irresponsibility to pass huge tax cuts for the very wealthy while, at the same time, not even providing any assistance in the budget for the Low-Income Home Energy Assistance Program. Also, cutting funding for renewable energy research and also neglecting to get a national energy policy in place to help consumers. This is the height of irresponsibility.

The LIHEAP program helps low-income Americans pay their utility bills. It is severely underfunded, so we must fight for an increase in LIHEAP funding this year for our senior citizens and our low-income residents.

Finally, this energy crisis has gotten so bad that many of our California

State legislators and the city of Oakland have joined together to file a lawsuit to make sure that the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission establish just and reasonable prices. It is unconscionable that the price gouging continues to go on, and that our residents in California are going to face a very serious hot summer.

Mr. Speaker, we must move forward with price caps. We must insist that our Federal Government insist that the FERC do this, and we must do this right away.

BLIND CHOICES

(Mr. OWENS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, the spirit of Tiananmen Square, blind and extreme, has invaded decisions about energy policies in California. The same spirit of the tanks in Tiananmen Square has invaded the latest decisions with respect to Vieques in Puerto Rico. Both the Navy and a Federal judge are blindly pursuing a policy which rules out the choices of the people, refuses to recognize the choices of the people, and have resorted to measures like putting people in jail for 90 days.

One New York leader, Al Sharpton, has now been sentenced to 90 days in jail in Puerto Rico, and several other political leaders have been sentenced to 40 days in jail.

This kind of extremism will only make martyrs of people and also will call for an invasion of Vieques. The Navy does not need Vieques that badly. We should listen to the will of the people, not have a blind eye similar to the tanks that rolled over the will of the people at Tiananmen Square.

Mr. Speaker, judges have done enough harm also in this generation and should stop seeking their 15 minutes of fame. This judge is wrong. These sentences are wrong. Vieques should be set free.

RISE IN ENERGY PRICES

(Mr. WELLER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Speaker, I have been enjoying some of the rhetoric I have been hearing from some of my friends on the other side of the aisle today. Clearly, when it comes to a rise in energy prices, the policies of my friends on the left side of the aisle is very simple, and that is called pass the buck.

They talk about the California energy crisis. Who has been in charge in California? A Democratic governor, a Democratic State legislature. Who prevented the power plants from being built over the last decade? A Democratic governor, a Democratic State legislature.

Of course, we at the national level in Chicago are seeing over $2 gasoline. Why? Because a Democratic administration in the White House failed for 8 years to do anything about energy.

We have a new President that has been in office now for 4½ months, 5 months. He inherited clearly serious energy problems. He has now come forward with an energy proposal which deserves bipartisan support.

The bottom line is we need to conserve. We need to find new domestic sources, and we must reduce our independence on imported oil.

ENERGY CRISIS REQUIRES ACTION

(Mr. BERRY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, we definitely have an energy crisis in this country. There is no question about it, and it is time for us to find a solution.

It does us no good to try to blame each other. The President and the Republicans put forth their energy policy last week. It calls for more production. We agree with that. It is a partial solution.

We know we are going to have to have increased production. I was disappointed that it did not call for increased production from the OPEC countries on the short term.

We are the greatest economic power on the face of the Earth. And if we can be held hostage by OPEC in this time, then we are not the greatest economic power on the face of the Earth; and we should recognize that and deal with it appropriately.

We know that conservation is the cheapest and quickest way to help our situation. We know that alternative energy sources are important and should be researched and developed as is appropriate. We know that the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission should do the responsible thing.

FREEDOM IS NOT FREE

(Mr. McNULTY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. McNULTY. Mr. Speaker, like many Americans, I like to go around bragging about how we live in the freest and most open democracy on the face of the Earth, but freedom is not free.

We paid a tremendous price for it. I try not to let a day go by without remembering with gratitude all of those who, like my brother Bill, made the supreme sacrifice, to remember all of those who, like some of the people I am looking at in this Chamber right now, were willing to put their lives on the line for all that we hold dear.

As we approach Memorial Day in the year 2001, I am going to try to continue to keep my priorities straight and to do every day what I am doing this morning. I thank God for my life. I thank veterans for my way of life.

TRANSPORTATION CONGESTION

(Mr. KIRK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KIRK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the gentleman from Alaska (Mr. YOUNG) for his diligent work this week in addressing the increasing problem of transportation congestion in our Nation.

As a Member of Congress who represents a suburban district that has experienced a great deal of growth, I see the importance of a well-maintained and modern transportation system on a daily basis.

The residents of the 10th Congressional District of Illinois consistently ranked transportation needs as one of the primary challenges facing our way of life. Our region is gripped by highway gridlock and exacerbated by continued outward expansion of residential and commercial properties.

Mr. Speaker, our Nation's transportation infrastructure is critical to our social and economic vitality. We must continue to improve local commuter rail lines that will bring thousands of automobiles off congested roadways.

It will also help us meet the mandates of the Clean Air Act; and, additionally, we need to invest in high-speed rail that will give an alternative to congested airports.

Mr. Speaker, I look forward to working with the gentleman from Alaska on this matter and thank him for the commitment this week to fighting congestion.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LAHOOD). Pursuant to clause 8, rule XX, the pending business is the question of agreeing to the Speaker's approval of the Journal of the last day's proceedings.

The question is on the Speaker's approval of the Journal.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. McNULTY. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 336, nays 71, answered "present" 1, not voting 24, as follows:

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

(Mr. ARMEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Speaker, this is to advise the Members of the schedule for the rest of the day and the remainder of the week.

Obviously, we are all very excited. We are very pleased about what we did in this Chamber last night with respect to the education of our children. We have an opportunity now, in the final moments of completing a conference report on a tax reduction that is anticipated by the whole Nation, for which we have a commitment by both bodies and the White House, to get that work done this weekend. The Members, of course, are anxious about their own plans with respect to their pending District Work Period time with their constituents and with their families. So let me tell you what I can tell you now.

We will soon be reconvening the conference between our body and the other body. It is, of course, all of our hopes that that can go smoothly and expeditiously, but one can never know. So as it is now, I will be returning to that conference, we will be keeping the Members as posted as we can, as timely as we have any information that might be helpful to you in making your plans. We will get that out to you through our whip notices or otherwise.

It would be my effort to come back to this floor at 5 o'clock with another update, so that at least if we do not have any definitive information before then, you can get some information at that time about what it is we hope to do. Members should be advised, I think as of now, definitely there will be no votes before 7 o'clock tonight. If things go well, it is possible we could return and complete the work on the tax bill this evening. If it is not done this evening, we will get that information to you as quickly as possible and then we would find ourselves looking for and hoping for a chance to complete the work tomorrow.

I would hope, as you all do, that we could do that tomorrow, but we have been through these things before and it is a very big bill. There are many Members in both bodies that have heartfelt interests in the bill. The conference could, in fact, take some time to work all those things out.

So what I would ask the Members to do is, one, be of good cheer. We are doing something important for the Nation. It is difficult, but we are called upon in this body at times to make difficult personal sacrifices.

We will go to the conference, commence with the conference, move as quickly as we can and keep you as well informed as possible. But I can say now you will not expect a vote in this Chamber before 7 o'clock. We will get you updated information by 5 o'clock and you ought to be prepared to remain.

Let me just make the point that it is very clearly the intention of this body and of the other body to not adjourn for the Memorial Day District Work Period until this work is done, the conference is completed in both bodies and sent to the President. So that could mean we would be here throughout the weekend. I do not believe it will come to that, but we obviously all need to be prepared for that possibility.

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, will the distinguished majority leader yield?

Mr. ARMEY. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. RANGEL. When the majority leader refers to the conference, is he talking about the conference that the Speaker selected, you, me, and my chairman, to attend?

Mr. ARMEY. I believe, obviously, I am referring to the conference that was appointed in both bodies to consider the final disposition of the reduction in taxes.

Mr. RANGEL. Will the majority leader yield further?

Mr. ARMEY. I am happy to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RANGEL. So when you are talking about the conference, that includes me?

Mr. ARMEY. I believe the gentleman from New York was appointed from the Chair just yesterday.

Mr. RANGEL. Will the majority leader yield further?

Mr. ARMEY. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. RANGEL. Then last night, the meeting that took place as relates to the Senate and House bill, we would not call that a conference, now, would we?

Mr. ARMEY. We would call that a meeting where we hoped to get things done. And, obviously, when it becomes time to complete the work, there will be, I am sure, some formal meeting of the conferees, their signatures will be attached, it will be announced to the body, and we will be happy to come back here and make our votes in favor of it and move on to go home and celebrate our good deeds with our constituents back home.

Mr. RANGEL. If the gentleman will yield further, I am just trying to clear up when we are having conferences with Republicans and when we are having conferences as designated by the Speaker, because since you do not intend to really tell us what is going on as a body until 5 o'clock, if the legislative conference is going to take place at 5 o'clock, then I would like to know while you have your conferences leading up to that.

Mr. ARMEY. I thank the gentleman for his comments.

Mr. RANGEL. Well, you did not answer, though.

RECESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LAHOOD). Pursuant to clause 12 of rule I, the Chair declares the House in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION WAIVING REQUIREMENT OF CLAUSE 6(a) OF RULE XIII WITH RESPECT TO CONSIDERATION OF CERTAIN RESOLUTIONS

Mr. REYNOLDS, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 107-81) on the resolution (H. Res. 150) waiving a requirement of clause 6(a) of rule XIII with respect to consideration of certain resolutions reported from the Committee on Rules, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

(Mr. ARMEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Speaker, let me say, first of all, the discussions on the very important tax reduction bill that the Nation is so excited about are continuing.

Members should be advised, Mr. Speaker, that we would expect no votes on the floor of the House before 4 p.m. tomorrow. Members should be here ready to vote by 4 p.m. in the afternoon tomorrow.

Members should be prepared, when they present themselves here at 4 p.m., to remain here in town available for votes throughout the evening and throughout Saturday. Hopefully, it will not be necessary beyond that, but Members should return for those votes and be prepared to stay here in town to complete the work through the remainder of the day, the evening and through Saturday.

Mr. Speaker, I would encourage Members if they are planning on traveling at all, if they are planning on taking a short jaunt back home, and I hope they can, that they check with the Whip's office or with the cloakroom so that we are able to notify you.

In any event, we will be on the floor. We will be doing business at 4 p.m. tomorrow, and it is the intention of the House and the other body for us to then continue the work until it is completed in both bodies throughout whatever period of time after 4 p.m. tomorrow it takes to complete the work.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank Members for their cooperation and, I might add, their good humor. These are difficult times. We all have important things we would like to do back home that we have been planning to do at home. We have, of course, time with our family that is so important to all of us.

The Members on this occasion are being called upon to do, as it were, extra, difficult work, extra, difficult hours, the reward being, of course, to all the tax-paying constituents in their district.

Mr. Speaker, I, for one, would like to just appreciate everybody for their good humor and their good work.

HOOR OF MEETING ON TOMORROW

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today, it adjourn to meet at 10 a.m. tomorrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Any amounts so contributed on behalf of any individual shall be collected by the Secretary concerned from such individual (by deduction from pay or otherwise) and shall be credited to the appropriation from which such contribution was made.

“(2)(A) The Secretary shall determine the premium amounts to be charged for life insurance coverage for spouses of members under this subchapter.

“(B) The premium amounts shall be determined on the basis of sound actuarial principles and shall include an amount necessary to cover the administrative costs to the insurer or insurers providing such insurance.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendments be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the original request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not plan to object, but reserve my right to object.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 1801, the Veterans’ Survival Benefits Improvements Act of 2001, and I encourage all Members of the House to support this measure.

The measure now before the House is derived from legislation approved by this body earlier this year. This legislation contains several important provisions contained in the House-passed bill, an important healthcare provision proposed by the other body, and several technical amendments.

Mr. Speaker, I would prefer that all the provisions contained in H.R. 801 as approved by the House earlier this year were included in the measure before us now, but that is not the case. Mr. Speaker, I am committed, as I know the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. SMITH) is, to pursuing the enactment of all the provisions contained in the bill as originally approved by the House.

The legislation includes a number of important provisions which deserve the support of this House. These include increasing from $200,000 to $250,000, effective October 1, 2000, the maximum Servicemembers’ Group Life Insurance Benefit for survivors of servicemen who died in the performance of duty and who were previously insured for the maximum benefits.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Texas (Mr. REYES) for his determined leadership on this important issue requiring the VA to ensure that eligible dependents are made aware of VA services through media and veterans' publications. This provision is derived from the legislation authored by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. DOYLE), a committed advocate for veterans and their dependents and survivors; and I want to salute the gentleman for his successful leadership for VA outreach to the dependents.

It also includes coverage under the Servicemembers' Group Life Insurance and provides for benefits under CHAMPVA for veterans' survivors and those eligible for hospital insurance benefits under Medicare.

Mr. Speaker, I thank everyone who has contributed to this measure. This is a good piece of legislation. Mr. Speaker, I encourage all of my Members to support it.

Mr. Speaker, under my reservation of objection, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. SMITH).

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. EVANS), my good friend, for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, I am very proud to bring to the floor today H.R. 801, as amended, the Veterans' Survivor Benefits Improvements Act of 2001.

It is fitting that we consider this legislation shortly before the Memorial Day period, a day on which we remember all of those who died while serving in our Nation's Armed Forces.

This bill is a reminder of what we have owed to the survivors of our servicemen and women. And although much remains to be done by this Congress, it is the harbinger of what we can accomplish to keep our commitment to veterans and to their families.

Mr. Speaker, those who have been following this particular bill may be a little bit surprised that it does not contain all of the provisions that were in the bill when we originally passed it in the House late March. Mr. Speaker, I want to ensure my colleagues that those provisions that were stricken by the Senate amendment remain the subject of a very active conversation between our colleagues over on the Senate side. We expect that the Senate will hold hearings on most, if not all, of those provisions later this year and we will be reintroducing them as well.

Virtually all of those who have testified before our Subcommittee on Benefits earlier this year expressed support for the provision of H.R. 801; and I anticipate that when the Senate holds its hearings, they will have the input from the VSOs and will be supportive of those provisions.

Mr. Speaker, I also want to encourage the Senate to give favorable consideration to H.R. 811, the Veterans Hospital Emergency Repair Act; and I just remind my colleagues that we passed that last March as well.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I would like to provide a very brief explanation of the provisions being considered today. When Congress created the Civilian Health and Medical Program, Veterans Affairs program nearly 30 years ago, it intended CHAMPVA to provide services for certain severely disabled veterans' families that were similar to the benefits furnished to retired families under CHAMPUS.

Over the years, however, CHAMPUS changed from a simple fee-basis reimbursement program to a managed care activity now known as TRICARE. Last year, TRICARE became entwined with Medicare as a secondary payer for military retired families under the "TRICARE for Life" extension approved by the Floyd Spence National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2001.

What we are doing today with H.R. 801 is an effort to make the two programs comparable once again by authorizing benefits similar to those under the TRICARE for Life.

H.R. 801 also directs VA to improve outreach services of spouses, surviving spouses, children and dependent parents of veterans and requires the VA to ensure that eligible dependents are made aware of veterans' services through the media and veterans' publications.

As amended, H.R. 801 retains the House provision to expand the Servicemembers' Group Life Insurance program to provide coverage for the spouse and children of a servicemember enrolled in the insurance program. This is a very family-friendly provision, and I am glad it survived over on the Senate side.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, within the last few years, we have lost a number of servicemembers to plane crashes, training accidents, and, of course, to acts of terrorism at sea. Last year, the Congress approved legislation to increase the maximum amount of the Servicemembers' Group Life Insurance from $200,000 to $250,000. Even though the bill was signed into law on November 1 of 2000, this particular provision did not go into effect until April of this year. The Senate amendment to H.R. 801 leaves unchanged the House proposal to provide an increase retroactive to October 1, 2000 for survivors of servicemembers who died during the performance of their duty and had previously elected maximum insurance amount.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from Texas (Mr. REYES), the gentlewoman from Virginia (Mrs. JO ANN DAVIS), along with Senator JOHN WARNER, for working with the full committee and for working so very hard on this provision.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. EVANS) for the gentleman's steadfast leadership, not just for this provision, but for all of the contents of this bill and for working in a very bipartisan way on so many of these issues that we have and will continue to bring to the floor.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. REYES).

Mr. REYES. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, as an original cosponsor and strong supporter of H.R. 801, the Veterans' Survivor Benefits Improvements Act of 2001, I am pleased that we will have an opportunity to address some of its provisions before this Memorial Day. It is our deeds, as well as our words, that should be used to measure the respect that we pay our departed servicemembers.

Mr. Speaker, I want to acknowledge the cooperation of the gentleman from New Jersey (Chairman SMITH) and the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. EVANS), the ranking member, as well as the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. HAYWORTH), in working with the other body to move this legislation forward. I hope that we will have an opportunity to address the provisions of H.R. 801 not included in the Senate amendment in the very near future.

Mr. Speaker, I particularly want to highlight the insurance provisions of this bill. I am very pleased that the bill retains the provision inserted at my request to make the beginning of fiscal year 2001 the effective date for the increase in the maximum amount of Servicemembers' Group Life Insurance from $200,000 to $250,000 for those who have lost their lives during the performance of military duties.

As a Vietnam veteran, I know the dangers of combat. Since October 1, 2000, we have sadly lost a number of uniformed service members during the performance of military training exercises. As I emphasized during the subcommittee hearing on H.R. 801, I was particularly concerned that those who lost their lives in the terrorist attack on the U.S.S. Cole as well as those, such as Specialist Rafael Olvera Rodriguez, who was an El Paso native and died in the Black Hawk helicopter crash over Hawaii, would qualify for increased maximum benefits.

Since the Cole attack, others performing official duties have died in North Carolina, Georgia, and Kuwait. Two Coast Guardsmen died after an accident while on patrol; two pilots died when their Army plane crashed in Germany; and two Air Force planes disappeared from Scotland with the loss of life.

The effective date of October 1, 2000, is intended to provide the maximum benefit of $250,000 for SGLI insured members, such as those who have lost their lives in the performance of their duty and who were insured for the maximum benefit at the time of their deaths. I know that the families of the SGLI members will certainly support this benefit.

I also support the provision allowing family members to be covered under the SGLI program. This is a needed improvement and will put our service members on par with other persons who have access to commercial insurance.

I strongly support the provisions for outreach to veterans' dependents suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. DOYLE), a very strong advocate for our Nation's veterans. Those who are entitled to veterans' benefits must have appropriate information in order to access them.

Finally, the technical amendments in the bill clarify important provisions of law and will improve the administration of educational benefits.

I cannot think of a better way for us to send a clear message this Memorial Day than to support H.R. 801. I urge all Members to support this bill.

Mr. MORAN of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I want to recognize Chairman SMITH, Ranking Member EVANS, Health Subcommittee Ranking Member FILNER, as well as Chairman SPECTER and Ranking Member ROCKEFELLER of the Senate Committee on Veterans' Affairs, for their leadership and support for this bill, H.R. 801, the "Veterans' Survivor Benefits Improvements Act of 2001."

Mr. Speaker, passage of this bill is a good reminder of why the Nation celebrates Memorial Day. There are many ways that people choose to honor our veterans. A number of veterans' organizations choose to honor the brave men and women who have given their lives for this country by observing a moment of silence. Others choose to visit one of the many memorials built in honor of veterans, and touch the engraved names of their departed loved ones, to feel their presence once again. Those of us here today on the floor of the House have the rare opportunity to honor not only our veterans, but also their dependents and survivors as well, with the passage of this legislation before us today.

Often on this floor Members recognize Americans who gave of themselves because of love of country. Today I speak not only in praise of our Nation's veterans but also in praise of their families and their survivors. Throughout our history as a nation, the fight to protect and preserve our freedoms has not only been met on the battlefield. It has also been a struggle in the homes of our veterans—by mothers, fathers, sons, and daughters, who carried on despite facing the illness, injury, or loss of a loved one.

The "Veterans' Survivor Benefits Improvements Act of 2001," legislation that we are approving today and sending to the President, is a written acknowledgement of our debt. It establishes, in the CHAMPVA program, health coverage equal to that of "TRICARE for Life" for military families. Under H.R. 801, any beneficiary covered by CHAMPVA, who becomes eligible for Medicare, will automatically be covered by CHAMPVA for "out-of-pocket" costs not paid by Medicare or other insurance. In effect, CHAMPVA will become a secondary payer for these Medicare beneficiaries.

While we can never expect to balance the scales to pay back the enormous debt we owe to our Nation's veterans and their families, we can ensure our veterans and their families will have a better tomorrow. As we approach another Memorial Day, let us pass this legislation to show our commitment to all Americans who, in President Lincoln's phrase, have "borne the battle" for this country.

Again, I thank the Chairman for his leadership, and urge my colleagues to support this important legislation.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LAHOOD). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on H.R. 801.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

CONTINUATION OF EMERGENCY WITH RESPECT TO FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF YUGOSLAVIA—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 107-76)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on International Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

Section 202(d) of the National Emergencies Act (50 U.S.C. 1622(d)), provides for the automatic termination of a national emergency unless, prior to the anniversary date of its declaration, the President publishes in the Federal Register and transmits to the Congress a notice stating that the emergency is to continue in effect beyond the anniversary date. I have sent the enclosed notice to the Federal Register for publication, stating that the national emergencies declared with respect to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) (the "FRY (S&M)") in 1992 and with respect to Kosovo in 1998, are to continue beyond May 30, 2001, and June 9, 2001, respectively. The most recent notice continuing these emergencies was published in the Federal Register on May 26, 2000.

With respect to the 1992 national emergency, on December 27, 1995, President Clinton issued Presidential Determination 96-7, directing the Secretary of the Treasury, inter alia, to suspend the application of sanctions imposed on the FRY (S&M) and to continue to block property previously blocked until provision of the other successor states of the former Yugoslavia. This sanctions relief, in conformity with United Nations Security Council Resolution 1022 of November 22, 1995 (hereinafter the "Resolution"), as an essential factor motivating Serbia and Montenegro's acceptance of the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina initialed in Dayton on November 21, 1995, and signed in Paris on December 14, 1995 (hereinafter the "Peace Agreement").

Sanctions against both the FRY (S&M) and the Bosnian Serbs were subsequently terminated by United Nations Security Council Resolution 1074 of October 1, 1996. This termination, however, did not end the requirement of the Resolution that those blocked funds and assets that are subject to claims and encumbrances remain blocked, until unblocked in accordance with applicable law.

Until the status of all remaining blocked property is resolved, the Peace Agreement implemented, and the terms of the Resolution met, this situation continues to pose an unusual and extraordinary threat to the national security, foreign policy, and economy of the United States. For these reasons, I have determined that the 1992 emergency, and the measures adopted pursuant thereto, must continue beyond May 30, 2001.

With respect to the 1998 national emergency regarding Kosovo, on January 17, 2001, President Clinton issued Executive Order 13192 in view of the peaceful democratic transition begun in the FRY (S&M); the continuing need to promote full implementation of the United Nations Security Council Resolution 827 of May 25, 1993, and subsequent resolutions calling for all states to cooperate fully with the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY); the illegitimate control over FRY (S&M) political institutions and economic resources or enterprises exercised by former President Slobodan Milosevic, his close associates and other persons, and those individuals' capacity to repress democracy or perpetrate or promote further human rights abuses; and the continuing threat to regional stability and implementation of the Peace Agreement. The order lifts and modifies, with respect to future transactions, most of the economic sanctions imposed against the FRY (S&M) in 1998 and 1999 with regard to the situation in Kosovo. At the same time, the order imposes restrictions on transactions with certain persons described in section 1(a) of the order, namely Slobodan Milosevic, his close associates and supporters and persons under open indictment for war crimes by ICTY. The order also provides for the continued blocking of property or interests in property blocked prior to the order's effective date due to the need to address claims or encumbrances involving such property.

Because the crisis with respect to the situation in Kosovo and with respect to Slobodan Milosevic, his close associates and supporters and persons under open indictment for war crimes by ICTY has not been resolved, and because the status of all previously blocked property has yet to be resolved, this situation continues to pose an unusual and extraordinary threat to the national security and foreign policy of the United States. For these reasons, I have determined that the emergency declared with respect to Kosovo, and the measures adopted pursuant thereto, must continue beyond June 9, 2001.

SPECIAL ORDERS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the Speaker's announced policy of January 3, 2001, and under a previous order of the House, the following Members will be recognized for 5 minutes each.

WORKING FAMILIES FLEXIBILITY ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mrs. BIGGERT) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mrs. BIGGERT. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to introduce a bill entitled the Working Families Flexibility Act. This bill has several components. First of all, the Working Families Flexibility Act allows employees to choose, through a written agreement with their employer, entered into knowingly and voluntarily by the employee, to receive paid time off instead of cash wages for overtime. A compensatory time agreement may not be a condition of employment, and an employee could withdraw from a compensatory time agreement at any time.

As with cash overtime pay, compensatory time would accrue at a rate of 1½ times the employees regular rate of pay for each hour worked over 40 within a 7-day period. The legislation would not affect the 40-hour workweek or the calculation of overtime.

Employees could accrue up to 160 hours of compensatory time each year. An employer would be required to pay cash wages for any unused, accrued time at the end of the year or within 30 days after receiving a written request from an employee.

Employers must provide employees with at least 30 days' notice prior to cashing out any accrued compensatory time or discontinuing a compensatory time program. An employer may, however, only cash out accrued time in excess of 80 hours.

Employees may use accrued compensatory time within a reasonable time after making the request.

All of the enforcement remedies, including action by the Department of Labor and individual law suits, under current law will apply if an employer fails to pay wages to an employee for accrued compensatory time or refuses to allow an employee to use accrued compensatory time.

Employers who coerce employees into choosing compensatory time instead of overtime wages or using accrued compensatory time will be liable to the employee for double damages.

One would think that providing working men and women with more control over their work schedules is a no-brainer, but private sector employees and employers alike are bound by the Fair Labor Standards Act, or FLSA, which does not permit such flexibility.

I think it is fair to say that this law which was enacted during the Depression and established a workweek of 40 hours in overtime pay was designed to be effective in a different day and age and needs to be updated.

Over the past 60-plus years, the America workplace has undergone a dramatic change in composition, character, and demands. What was once a static, agriculture-and-manufacturing-based economy with a primarily male workforce has evolved into a fast-paced, working environment based on global services and high technology with nearly equal numbers of women as well as men in the workforce.

Workers today, more than ever, need and do face a difficult dilemma: how to balance the demands of a job while having adequate time for family, friends, and outside commitments. This situation has become even more pronounced because many families now rely on two incomes to survive. While this conflict weighs most heavily on women, all workers, regardless of gender experience, conflict between work and the family and between watching their child's baseball game or going through a stack of papers on their desk.

The Working Families Flexibility Act will help to ease these pressures by providing the flexibility that working parents need to spend quality time with their families.

Before I go any further, I would like to stress that nothing in this legislation would require employees to take comp time instead of overtime pay, nor could employers force employees to take comp time. Rather, now they are given the choice of comp time or overtime. This bill does not relieve employers of any obligation to pay overtime. I want to stress that this bill does not affect the standard 40-hour workweek.

The legislation contains numerous safeguards to ensure that employees could not be coerced into choosing comp time over cash wages. The legislation requires an employer to annually pay cash wages for any unused comp time accrued by the employee. Employees may withdraw from a comp time agreement at any time and request a cash-out of any or all of his or her accrued unused comp time.

Mr. Speaker, comp time makes good policy; and it also has another benefit, making employees happy. There will always be working men and women who want and need the extra pay that comes from working overtime hours. But for many workers, having the additional time off is a far more attractive option, and that is an option they should have.

Comp time is also good for business because smart companies know how flexibility can help to recruit and retain top-notch employees. In sum, Mr. Speaker, the Working Families Flexibility Act is good for workers. It is good for women and is especially good for families.

Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce the Working Families Flexibility Act, which allows employers to offer American workers the option of voluntarily taking compensatory time off in lieu of taking overtime pay. I am pleased that 33 of my colleagues have joined me as original cosponsors of this pro-family, pro-worker, pro-women legislation.

One would think that providing working men and women with more control over their work schedules is a "no brainer", but private sector employees and employers alike are bound by the Fair Labor Standards Act of FLSA, which does not permit such flexibility. I think it's fair to say that this law, which was enacted during the depression and established a work week of 40 hours, and overtime pay, was designed to be effective in a different day and age and needs to be updated.

Over the past 60-plus years, the American workplace has undergone a dramatic change in composition, character, and demands. What once was a static, agriculture- and manufacturing-based economy with a primarily male workforce has evolved into a fast-paced, working environment based on global services and high technology with nearly equal numbers of women and men in the workforce.

Workers today, more than ever before, face a difficult dilemma: how to balance the demands of a job while having adequate time for family, friends and outside commitments. This situation has become even more pronounced because many American families now rely on two incomes to survive. And while this conflict weighs most heavily on women, all workers—regardless of gender—experience conflict between work and the family, between watching their child's baseball game or going through that stack of papers on their desk.

The Working Families Flexibility Act will help to ease these pressures by providing the flexibility that working parents need to spend quality time with their families. This legislation, which mirrors a bill passed by the House during the 105th Congress, amends the FLSA to allow private sector employees to access something that their colleagues working in federal, state and local governments have had for many years—the option of choosing either cash wages or paid time off as compensation for working overtime hours.

Before I go any further, I want to stress that nothing in this legislation would require employees to take comp time instead of overtime pay. Nor could employers force employees to take comp time. Rather they now can be given the choice of comp time or overtime. This bill does not relieve employers of any obligation to pay overtime. I also want to stress that this bill does not affect the standard 40-hour workweek.

Now, here is what the bill does do: under this legislation, employers will be able to offer comp time as an option for employees. Employees would then have a choice, through an agreement with the employer, to opt for overtime pay in the form of paid time off. As is currently the case with overtime pay, comp time hours would accrue at a rate of one and one-half hours of comp time for each hour of overtime worked. Employees could accrue up to 160 hours of comp time within a 12-month period.

This legislation contains numerous safeguards to ensure that employees could not be coerced into choosing comp time over cash wages. The legislation requires an employer to annually pay cash wages for any unused comp time accrued by the employee. Employees may withdraw from a comp time agreement at any time and request a cashout of any or all of his or her accrued, unused comp time. The employer has 30 days in which to comply with the request. The legislation also requires an employer to provide the employee with at least 30 days notice prior to cashing out any accrued time in excess of 80 hours or prior to discontinuing a policy of offering comp time.

Employees are able to use their accrued comp time at anytime, so long as its use does not unduly disrupt the operations of the business—this is the same standard used in the public sector and under the Family and Medical Leave Act. Employers also would be prohibited from requiring employees to take accrued time solely at the convenience of the employer. Again, I want to reiterate that this legislation has no effect on the traditional 40-hour workweek or the way in which overtime is calculated.

Mr. Speaker, comp time makes for good policy and it also has another benefit—making employees happy. There always will be working men and women who want and need the extra pay that comes from working overtime hours. But for many workers, having the additional time off is a far more attractive option, and that's an option they should have.

Comp time also is good for business because smart companies know how flexibility can help efforts to recruit and retain top-notch employees. Concerns over the well-being of the family often force parents to leave jobs that do not fit their family needs or forego jobs that would put stress on home lives.

In sum, Mr. Speaker, The Working Families Flexibility Act is good for workers, it is good for women, and it is especially good for families. The bill updates an outdated law designed for the 1930s workplace and makes it relevant for today's workforce.

Today's working men and women want increased flexibility and choices regarding scheduling and compensation, yet federal law prevents them from having such options. I trust my colleagues agree that employees and employers should not be prevented from making mutually agreeable arrangements that meet both personal and business needs.

I think the time and circumstances are right for us to pass this much-needed legislation. I urge my colleagues to join this effort to pass a strong comp time bill that will be good for workers, businesses, the economy, and America's families.

Let me take a moment to recognize Congressman CASS BALLENGER for his dedicated and untiring work on the comp time issue and to the Chairman of the House Subcommittee on Workforce Protections, Representative CHARLIE NORWOOD, for his strong commitment to this issue. Finally, let me thank the Chairman of the full Committee on Education and the Workforce, JOHN BOEHNER, for his support of America's working men and women.

CALIFORNIA ENERGY CRISIS

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. OSBORNE). Under the Speaker's announced policy of January 3, 2001, the gentleman from California (Mr. SHERMAN) is recognized for 60 minutes as the designee of the minority leader.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the Democratic leader for assigning me this hour of time. I hope very much that several of my colleagues from California and other western States will come and join me on this floor so that we can discuss together the energy crisis, the electric crisis, the natural gas crisis affecting California and the adjoining States.

In the event that some of my colleagues do not come down and join me, I do not know whether I will spend a full hour speaking about our electric crisis, I will go off and do several other subjects involving foreign policy and my service on the Committee on International Relations; but it is my hope, my expectation that this full hour will be devoted to the electric and natural gas crisis in the West and that several of my colleagues from western States will join me as it proceeds.

I have come to this floor every evening this week to try to eliminate and dispel some of the misinformation about what is going on in California and the West and how we got into this situation. I want to take some time to describe the situation and to describe that some of the insults hurled at the State of California are manifestly not only malicious but false.

What is the situation in California? In 1999, in the year 2000, and again this year, California will use virtually the exact same amount of electricity. In fact, in the year 2000, during the key peak hours, we used less electricity than we did in the prior year. Yet while we are getting the same amount of electricity, we are paying exorbitant prices. In 1999, for this amount of electricity, California paid $7 billion; last year, for the same amount, $32.5 billion; and this year, as things are shaping up, it will be $70 billion, ten times as much money for the same number of electrons.

We have had blackouts in California that we are told are a result of insufficient electric generation capacity; and, in fact, this summer our capacity may run a little bit below demand. But this last winter we used roughly 33,000 megawatts of electricity, the prior summer, the summer of 1999, we used 45,000 megawatts. None of the plants that existed, when we produced 45,000 megawatts at reasonable prices, was closed down; and yet in the winter we face blackouts, shutdowns. Why?

The answer is that certain plants have been closed for maintenance. I finally found out what "closed for maintenance" means. It means the plant has been closed to maintain a sky-high price for every megawatt. The number of plants closed for maintenance month after month after month over the last 9 months has been double, triple, sometimes quadruple the number of plants shut down in that same month 12 months earlier, or the prior year. Somehow, plants are closed for maintenance.

Keep in mind that one would expect during an energy crisis that the whole world is aware of plants would be closed for maintenance less because they would bring in crews to bring those plants back online. Folks would work overtime to get the electricity that the State needs. I have seen how quickly things can be repaired or maintained after our 1994 earthquake in my region of California. Yet now, when we need to maintain the most, we need the maintenance to take place the quickest, plants are shut down three times as much and huge chunks of what would be the supply of electricity are unavailable. Closed for maintenance.

As a result, the price is enormous. And that enormous and outrageous price is not for all the electricity we buy. Sixty percent of the electricity, roughly, in California, is still subject to rate regulation and fair prices are being paid. So that enormous, huge, unjustified transfer, the $63 billion extra we will pay for what a couple of years ago we called $7 billion of electricity, that all goes to roughly 40 percent of the producers. Those are the producers who came into our State and bought our electric plants from our local utilities as part of the wildly touted deregulation plan over the last several years. So we are paying 10 times the price, and almost all of the extra profits are going to 40 percent of the producers.

This is a deregulation experiment that has not worked. We might ask, how did California get into this? There are a few things: first, we did not expect that these private companies would close certain plants for maintenance in order to charge 10 times the going price for the electricity they did produce in other plants. We did not expect the gougers to prevail. And, second, we expected that if this deregulation did not work, we would reverse it.

Every experiment carries with it the possibility of a mistake; and time and time again when we try something out, we may have to reverse the situation. What we found, instead, was a power in the White House capable of using Federal law to prohibit California from going back to the regulated market that had served us relatively well for over 80 years. So we have a situation not where California does not have the generation capacity it needs. Frankly, we ought to have more. We ought to have a margin for safety, a surplus of available electricity. But no one thought that just because supplies were a bit tight that we would be paying 10 times, 20 times the fair price for the kilowatts provided to us by these independent companies, many of which are based in Texas. And we certainly did not believe that if this system did not work that we would be prohibited by Federal law from going back.

Now, what is the effect that this has had on California? Business bankruptcy, layoffs, and blackouts. And I do want to point out that up until recently, and I think even this summer, the blackouts are relatively modest compared to the news reports. A blackout is reported often when only one out of 100 or maybe one out of 30 of our homes loses power for 1 or 2 or 3 hours. But we expect that this summer there will be 30 to 50 days when one out of 30 or one out of 100 of our homes loses power; one out of 30 or one out of 100 of our businesses loses power.

It is not just the physical effect of the blackouts; it is also the psychological and business effect. How is our State supposed to attract business? How are we supposed to inspire our current businesses to expand? How are we supposed to be the driving force in this national economy when people see and talk about or are preoccupied with the blackouts in electricity? And even if there was not a single minute of blackout for a single consumer, the prices are enormous and the price effect would, by itself, cause a steep economic problem for the State of California.

Now, when a State is suffering not one but three disasters, a disaster because of blackouts, a disaster because of a decline in investment in our State, and, most significantly, enormous bills, three disasters, one would think that a representative from that State would be here before the Federal Government pleading for Federal money, money from all of my colleagues' districts to help the people in my district. I am not here to do that. That is not what California needs most. And, in fact, with a little bit of change in law, we would not need it at all.

I am not asking for electricity from my colleagues' districts. Except for the western States, it is impossible to send electricity into California. Do not mail us your batteries. Even in the western States, we are not asking for any other State to experience blackouts or shortages in order to supply California. I am not even here to ask for sympathy. It would not hurt; but, yet again, that is not what California needs. What California needs is to have our hands untied. Do not take the right to regulate these prices away from us, bring that right to the Federal level and then refuse to allow the regulation.

Yet that is what Federal law does. Federal law says that these independent generators, because they do not have retail customers, are not subject to our regulation. But that is okay, because the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission is supposed to do the job. The law says that they are supposed to assure fair and reasonable rates. And they have determined that California is being gouged. Yet they have decided to do absolutely nothing about it but sit back and smile and watch as billions of dollars, perhaps this year as much as $63 billion, are transferred from California consumers into the treasuries of a dozen very wealthy corporations, most of them based in the home State of the person who happens to control this administration and the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission.

We have a dereliction of duty in this administration. What do we do about it? First, we expose it, and we urge that the President get on the phone and demand that the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission finally do its job. Second, we turn to Congress, and we ask what about a piece of legislation requiring the Federal Government to do its job. Either of those would accomplish the task. A third possibility is that Federal law would simply be modified and say as long as we are going to sit here and say California has a problem, California ought to solve it. If the Federal Government is going to do nothing to help us, the least that could be done is to transfer the authority to regulate these generators back to California State government and then we will do the job.

Why are none of these things being done? Well, I have alluded to it. There is tremendous support in this administration for the rape of California. Some have said that is because California did not vote for this administration. I think, instead, it is because the beneficiaries of this rape have such close ties to the administration. Some have pointed out that not only is there a huge flow of money from California to these dozen or so corporations, but then there is a huge flow of money from those corporations to the party of the present administration and that these companies were instrumental in funding the Presidential campaign of this administration.

There is perhaps a third reason, or at least a pretext. What does this administration do for California with regard to regulating these energy rates? They lecture us. The lecture goes something like this:

You are suffering. There is nothing we are going to do to help you. We are going to continue to tie your hands, and you are going to like it because we are going to tell you the economic theory that tells you why you should be happy why there is no regulation. We will make the decision for you, but we will not suffer any of the consequences of this decision.

How does this lecture go? It goes something like this:

It is based on economics 101 at every college in this country. It says if you want more electricity, you have the price unregulated. You have the price go up. And if the price goes up, people will use less and the producers will produce more.

Let us examine that. It makes perfect sense unless there is monopoly power. But in our market there is that monopoly power, and that is why economics 101 is not enough and lectures and condescending comments to Californians are not enough.

First, as far as using electricity, California is second on the list, second only to Rhode Island in terms of conserving electricity, and those statistics were before we began our Statewide conservation plan. Californians today are conserving, and we are going to conserve more. We do not have to bankrupt our businesses to inspire conservation.

But what about the main part of the argument? The argument is if you allow the price to go up and up and up, producers will produce more. Now that is certainly true where there is no monopoly power. If the price of iceberg lettuce went to up $2, more farmers would find more land on which they could plant iceberg lettuce and there would be more production. But that is because there are tens of thousands of small producers or farms that could be producing iceberg lettuce, or any other farm commodity. That is what 101 economics is all about, those markets where you have thousands of small producers.

That is not our market for electricity. Keep in mind the electric grid for California extends only to the adjacent States, all of which are smaller in population and economy than we are, even when combined. So we cannot import electricity from the other States. The market is only the western States.

Second, electricity gets used up as you transmit it. You lose about 10 percent of the electricity for every 300–400 miles that you transmit it; so even if we did have electric grids connected, you would lose well over half the power in trying to move it that far. So the market is limited to those who can produce electricity in the western States.

There you have a few producers who have seen that they have market power. They have seen that even if all of the electricity is produced from the plants that are owned by our local utilities, and all of the electricity is produced from the Pacific Northwest hydroelectric plants, which cannot produce very much this year because of a drought, and all of the electricity is produced that can be produced from our municipal electric companies, there is still a need for virtually all of their plants to be on-line.

If they can shut down 10 or 20 percent of their plants, the price skyrockets. So let us bring it down to numbers. If we had regulation of these private producers, then let us say a plant that could produce electricity for $30 a megawatt could sell it for $50, the company that owned that plant would say, we make $20 for every megawatt, the more megawatts we make, the more profit we make. Let's maximize production. Regulated price would lead to maximized production.

But let us say it still costs $30 a megawatt to produce electricity, but the owners of these plants realize if they shut down a couple of turbines, and a couple of their buddies shut down a couple of their turbines, that the price will go not to $50 a megawatt but to $500 a megawatt.

Then they realize by producing a little bit less, they make a whole lot more. By creating a situation where we have to blackout 1 or 2 percent of the State, they are getting the maximum price for every megawatt they produce.

So that is why lectures based on the most simplistic models of a free market economy do nothing but a disservice. I do not know if this is a mere pretext at the White House and they know full well that their reasoning is suspect, or whether the White House is dominated by those who only took the basic course in economics and they feel passionately that somehow their imprisoning of California, them taking the decision-making power away from California, they may believe that it is somehow in our interest. Certainly facts have proven them wrong.

We have the same demand in California that we had a couple of years ago. Pretty much the same demand as a couple years before that. We know that price regulation works, gives us reasonable bills, gives us reliable power. The current situation is obviously a failure.

So only if you close your eyes to any advanced division courses in economics, and close your eyes to everything actually happening in the West, can you reach the conclusion that the absence of rate regulation on these private utilities is helping California. Yet that is what we are told.

In an effort to distract us from how abysmal Federal policy is in this circumstance, they have come up with another argument. That argument is that there is something evil about California and California deserves to be punished, it is all their fault. Every bit of suffering by every Californian is somehow the fault of some divinely ordained morality play, and has nothing to do with the economic regulation or lack therefore that comes from Washington.

This is, of course, a distraction. It makes no sense. Even if you think that California made tragic mistakes in its decision-making process, that is no reason not to regulate the price at which electricity is sold by these independent generators. Even if you say these wounds are self-inflicted, that is no reason to let the patient die when you know how to cure him. But the fact of the matter is that all of the attacks on California are not only insulting, they are also false.

The biggest attack against California is that our environmentalists prevented private industry from building plants in California when private industry knew that those plants were needed.

Mr. Speaker, there are five reasons why it is absolutely provable why California environmentalists and California decision-making is not in any way at fault, did not prevent the building of plants in California. I can prove that with five different independent reasons.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentlewoman from California (Ms. SANCHEZ).

Ms. SANCHEZ. Mr. Speaker, while many are trying to make this out as a California problem, it is my belief as an American that this is a problem for America, and we must not only address the California situation, but we also should be addressing this as a long-term policy and energy policy really for the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I think there are a lot of great States. All 50 States are great. Hawaii is beautiful. I was just down in Florida, it has great beaches. Who would not be envious of the New York Stock Exchange or the Blue Ridge Mountains or Aspen in Colorado? There are a lot of great things around our Nation.

Sometimes I think that people think because California is a wonderful place and we have had a great and strong economy for the past 8 years, we should be punished because something is happening in our State. The reality is that California is the sixth largest economy if it were a stand-alone Nation in the world. In a sense, we are even a larger part of what happens in the United States.

One of the reasons that we have been very successful with respect to our economy is that we are a part of America. We have this ability to trade across all of the State lines. We have an ability for people to move between the 50 States. We share ideas. We get people who come to our universities from other States. We are connected as a country.

Mr. SHERMAN. Absolutely.

Mr. Speaker, there are 50 great States. Some listening to my earlier remarks maybe thought that I thought there were only 49 great States, and I was somehow criticizing Texas. Texas is also a great State. I talk to my colleagues from Texas, and they are almost as upset as you and I are, that a dozen companies or half a dozen companies, many based in their State, are jacking up the prices. That does not reflect on the ethics of the average Texan; and it is of no benefit to the people of Texas.

We have 50 great States with great people in every one of those States.

Ms. SANCHEZ. Mr. Speaker, where goes California, so goes the rest of the Nation. Other States should take notice of these problems because other States will face these problems also.

What has happened, our economy has expanded so greatly, we never imagined that this type of energy draw would be required in California. Many say Californians are environmentalists and did not build plants. We can take a look and know it was not because of environmental regulations we have in California that we were not getting some of these plants on-line, part of it is a wider problem that happens with a lot of infrastructure, and that is the notin-my-backyard problem that happens with so many things, whether it is a jail or an airport or a utility plant.

I think the rest of the States need to understand we need to fix this in California and in the western States because when it is your turn, you want to learn from us about how not to head into this problem.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would point out that I think we have saved quite a number of States from disaster. How many of our Members have said to me, my State was thinking of deregulation. Boy, we stopped that one in a hurry.

I would point out that yes, there are situations where people say build it somewhere else, not in my backyard; but if you look at generating facilities, that was not really the case in California. There are other important facilities where you and I are aware that it ought to be done somewhere, and we cannot quite agree where.

But in the case of generation facilities, it was not either local communities saying not in my backyard nor environmentalists saying do not do it anywhere in the State, it was the absence of any private company that really wanted to build a plant.

I cannot find a single Member from anywhere in California that said that a company wanted to build a plant in my community, and they were prevented for this or that reason. They made this try, they worked with local people, and then they had to go away. We can all mention other facilities or things that they thought of doing in our districts because people did not want it.

Electric facilities are not on that list.

Ms. SANCHEZ. These facilities, as the gentleman knows, of course we have a couple coming online, one even as soon as the end of this summer.

Another problem that we have had is the transmission or the grid process by which we are able to transmit this energy. In fact, if one does not see it, one probably does not think about it. Think about all the people who were just used to flipping on the switch at home and never thought that electricity really came from somewhere. It was never given a second thought. There are many cases like this.

I think of the water problems that our country will face in the near future or sewage problems, for example, that we see many of our cities now where their underground piping has worn out, and there is not the money to replace that unless we do it at a Federal level or with some grant process or with a real thought to what is happening underground.

So I think a lot of times we get calls about fix the transportation system, or I am stuck in traffic or my plane was left on the tarmac for too long; but these other issues of will the electricity come on, will the water flow, are things that if one does not see it, we are not asked to fix it. We are not necessarily working or putting the political clout or the monies behind that.

I think as a Nation we need to understand that these problems are all of our problems, and we need to come together with good policies to fix this.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentlewoman from California (Ms. SANCHEZ) for her comments.

Mr. Speaker, I will share the five proofs that there were no bars toward building plants in California.

The first is it is simply not true. We are elected officials, some would say politicians. When a private company wants to build something big and they run into problems, that becomes an issue; and we all become aware of it. One of the first things they do is seek a meeting with whatever Members of Congress are in that area, with our friends in local government and State government; and sometimes we might support a project, sometimes we might think it is a bad project, but there is never a situation where there is a huge controversy over whether government will allow a big plant to be built and no politician knows about it.

One cannot have a governmental controversy without having elected officials know about it. We know that there was not a situation where people wanted to build power plants and were not allowed to.

The second proof is that for the 8 years of the prior Republican Governor, who, after all, served until just a couple of years ago, 8 years of a man who was often compared to then-Governor, now-President George Bush, not one plant was even applied for, not one, in a serious way. Not one application was approved by that Republican Governor for 8 years. That is not because Governor Pete Wilson was an environmental crackpot, because he was not. That was because nobody wanted to build plants in California.

How do I know nobody wanted to build plants in California? During the last several years, our local utilities had been selling off their existing plants, and they tried to get a good price for them. They really did not get a very good price for them. Why would anybody say I am desperate to build a new plant, but the California environmentalists will not let me if they will not pay a decent price for a plant that already exists?

We know that when something cannot be created because of environmental regulations, the old ones sell for more.

I am proud to represent Malibu. It is beautiful. A lot of people would like to live on the beach in Malibu. Now there you have environmentalists who will not let you build a beach house in Malibu and will not let you build a big beach house in Malibu, and will not let you build a tall beach house in Malibu.

One can be sure that they cannot buy an existing tall, big beach house in Malibu at a bargain price. One cannot buy it at a bargain because they cannot make any more. There is a shortage of beach houses in Malibu compared to the people who want them. There was not a shortage of power plants compared to those who wanted to buy them or build them.

In addition, and I have talked to some of the top scientists about this, an electron does not know when it crosses a State boundary. So if one is going to build a power plant, they are not building it to serve California. They are building it to serve everything within about 400 or 500 miles of that power plant, maybe a bit further. They are connecting it to the western grid, which includes every State from New Mexico to the State of Washington. That is the grid electricity can be sent on, and one can build anywhere in those States in order to supply those States.

So for us to believe that there were these companies that desperately wanted to build power plants and the evil California environmentalists would not let them, one has to believe that the evil environmentalists of Nevada would not let them build. I mean, when was the last time we were told that Nevada State government was in the hands of environmental crackpots? That is not what we hear.

So, in fact, there was no major effort to build plants anywhere in the West, both where environmentalists are strong and where environmentalists are not particularly strong, and there was no tremendous desire to own a power plant that already existed because even today if it had not been for a drought, an unexpected drought in the Pacific Northwest, there would not be a shortage. In fact, up until today I am not sure that there was a single day that the existing power plants were not capable of generating all the electricity that was demanded.

The reason for the shortage is not that plants were not built. The reason plants were not built was because there was not considered to be the likelihood of a shortage. Instead, the reason there is a shortage is that by creating an artificial shortage, they are able to drive the prices higher.

So I do not know if my colleague from Orange County has additional comments.

Ms. SANCHEZ. One of the other myths that we have heard is somehow that Californians are just these consumption hogs with respect to electricity. I think we were looking at some statistics the other day that showed that of the 50 States, we are behind Rhode Island, number two in the least amount consumed per person in any State as far as the electricity that we use.

So when people say we all are just consuming too much and leave all the lights on and we are just not paying attention to what is going on, we are actually one of the best States with respect to consumption of electricity per person in the entire United States. So I would like to dispel that myth where people are saying we just use too much energy, or we use more than the energy we should use.

Also going back to the fact that this is a concern for America, there are plenty of times, and we have seen these numbers over and over, where we send a lot of tax dollars to Washington and we are what one calls a donor State. We never get as much money as we send to Washington back into California. It is usually put in the pot out here; and when relief is going on for floods in areas or droughts in areas or tornadoes in areas, our money usually goes to help other States who are in need.

I would just say again that from a California perspective we are a team player. We want to be a part of the overall economy in the United States; and what has, I think, really angered some Members who are from California and the Pacific Northwest, and also many Californians, is that we have had an administration here in Washington who has basically said you all fix it; it is nobody else's problem. I think that is a very short view of what is really happening out in California.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do want to point out that those who say it is your problem, you go fix it, are the same ones who have tied our hands behind our backs, because it is Federal law that says we are not allowed to impose rate regulation on these independent utilities. So they sit there. We can almost hear the muffled laughter as they say it is your problem, go fix it, and, oh, let me strengthen those ropes just to make sure they are tight. Let me gag you as well so you cannot complain about those ropes.

I would give you an analogy here. Imagine that your home is burning down. Now, you might have one neighbor on one side of you that does not help you. Okay. But then you have the most malevolent neighbor who goes in, grabs your hose, impounds it, and then gives you a lecture about how it is your fault your house is burning, you should have read the 12 points about fire safety while your house is becoming a cinder.

California is burning. The hose is the right to regulate the wholesale price of electricity. That hose is being impounded by Washington, D.C.; and those who impound it are lecturing us. They are saying you do not need a hose to put out a fire. You need a lecture about how this fire is your fault.

Needless to say, this summer Californians will be getting those electric bills. Now, with other products, when I want to know where something was made, I pick it up and look for the tag on the back. Well, Californians are going to grab their electric bill, they are going to look for the tag on the back, and it is going to say, made in the corporate suites of Houston, under license from Washington, D.C. That is not the way this should happen.

That is why the bill that I am down here to speak for, a bill that many of us, I believe the gentlewoman has, have cosponsored was put forward by our colleague, the gentleman from California (Mr. HUNTER), one of the most conservative Members of the House, cosponsored by the gentleman from California (Mr. CUNNINGHAM). I cannot even characterize how conservative the gentleman from California (Mr. CUNNINGHAM) is. When was the last time you cosponsored a bill from the gentleman from California (Mr. CUNNINGHAM)?

Ms. SANCHEZ. I am from conservative Orange County.

Mr. SHERMAN. Excuse me. Excuse me.

My colleague, the gentleman from California (Mr. GALLEGLY), with whom I represent Ventura County, why are conservative Republicans sponsoring this bill? Because it is the right thing to do.

In the Senate, the bill is Feinstein-Smith. So there is bipartisan legislation, bicameral legislation blocked by the White House, while the problem continues.

Ms. SANCHEZ. One of the things that we have really asked for is sort of a time-out, a time to set some prices where we can take a look at where supplies really artificially taken off the markets in order to increase the price that we have had to pay in California. What is the real demand that we are facing now and the demand that we will face in the near future, and what suppliers do we really have, and will that be enough and what will be a time line? Really a time-out to make a plan of what happened, what is currently happening and what we must do for the future.

One of the things that we have asked for is maybe about a year's worth of some caps so that we can take the time to really understand the problem, rather than to try to legislate off the cuff, without enough information, which might make us have the situation worsen for California and for others. We are not asking for price caps for the next 10 years. We are just asking for some time in which we can understand the situation and with some bright minds sit down and think of the solution for this problem.

Mr. SHERMAN. I might add, in describing the bill that we both support, it is indeed temporary; just a couple of years. It is being called price caps. It is actually something that is less opposed than price caps by those that oppose it.

It is cost-plus-profit regulation. So it is not like we turn to every producer and say you cannot sell for more than $50 a megawatt. If you have a wind farm that was expensive to build and it cost you $80 a megawatt, 8 cents a kilowatt, we will let you sell for $90 or $100. So it is cost plus profit and that cost includes depreciation of your equipment. So it is a fair price for each producer, plus a generous profit.

Also the bill does call for investigation. We do need to investigate what has happened and how we have been gouged.

I would point out that the California Public Utilities Commission has done an investigation already. Not that we do not need to investigate more. They concluded that, yes, supply was withheld in order to move up the price.

There is another element to this bill and another element of the crisis that I do want to mention, and that is the natural gas crisis.

Now, throughout North America the price of natural gas has more than doubled, and that doubling is tough on many people around the country; and yet it is hard to say that that results from monopoly power.

There are thousands of producers of natural gas, and natural gas is a wonderful fuel. Its prior price had it cheaper than oil; now it is equal with oil in terms of the Btus it produces, and it burns clean. But in addition to this doubling of the North American price, the cost of moving natural gas from Texas and New Mexico and Colorado, where it is found, to California, went up by a factor of 12. So we pay more to move natural gas 800 or 900 miles than is the value of the natural gas. The shipping costs exceed the product cost. 12 cents.

Why did that happen? Again, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission came up with a bright idea. They punched a giant loophole in their regulation of the four big pipeline companies. Talk about market power. There are only four of these companies that have major pipelines bringing natural gas to all of California. Big loophole. They jacked up their price. Amazing. The FERC.

It is no surprise that many Californians say, we have been FERC'd. This bill, and it makes an awful lot of sense, will provide for a resumption of what we have had in this country for decades, and that is cost-plus-profit regulation of these pipelines, because we can have tens of thousands of producers of Iceberg lettuce. We can have thousands of producers of natural gas in various wells around the country, but it is simply natural that we are only going to have three or four major pipelines going from one particular location to another, or three or four pipeline companies. So that is why we need regulation. That is why for decades and decades we have had it. When we lost that regulation, we end up paying a huge amount.

Now, not only does that hurt us in our natural gas bills. I cook with natural gas, heat with natural gas, the bill goes out of sight. But also, it is built into the price of electricity, because that is the fuel that we burn in those fossil fuel plants that generate electricity in our State. So it creates a higher price for electricity and it also creates an incentive, as if an extra incentive was needed, for some of those companies to withhold production. When they withhold production, they burn less natural gas, and they jack the price up. If they operate at full tilt, they have to pay for that natural gas at those monopoly transportation prices.

So we do need to regulate natural gas transportation charges. We do need to investigate what has happened in the markets. We do need temporary cost-plus-profit regulation of those who generate electricity in the west.

Ms. SANCHEZ. Mr. Speaker, again, I would caution the rest of the country that if this can happen to California, which is one of the largest economies around, imagine that it could happen to someone else's State also. We really need to step back. This, I think, is an emergency in California, in particular, in the next 4 or 5 months during the hot summer of California. But this is a bill about stepping back and taking a look and learning from this so that we can, in an overall plan for the United States, make an energy policy that works for each State and for all business people and homeowners across the Nation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to shift just a little bit, because we are so preoccupied, quite naturally, with the short term in our own State, and talk a little bit about conservation and how important it is.

Now, the problem we have is that the President's budget and, frankly, this Congress, over its last 6 years of Republican control, has underfunded research, renewables and conservation; that, in fact, we have seen a tremendous savings of energy in this country due to our limited success in those areas. Even with that limited success, we have saved, I think the figure is a couple hundred billion dollars worth of energy, because we use renewables, because we have done the research, because we have conservation and greater efficiency.

So what did the Congress do during the 6 fiscal years it was in control while President Clinton was in the White House? Every single year, the amount spent on conservation efficiencies, renewables and research was cut. The total cuts probably meant that during the 6 years, we did 4 years' worth of the research, at least the amount provided for in President Clinton's budget. But then, starting with that lower amount that is in fiscal year 2001, the President submits a budget that shows a one-third reduction from that lower amount in the amount spent on research, renewables, conservation and efficiency.

Not good. So then, realizing that the country realizes that we have an energy crisis, that we need money spent on renewables and research and conservation, the President issues his energy plan. His energy plan was a beautiful, slick book put out by his press office, a wonderful press document, and in that plan he has $2 billion for clean coal, he has tax credits for conservation, he has money for research. It is all there in the pamphlet.

Ms. SANCHEZ. But it is not in the budget.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the pamphlet is not the law. The budget he submitted slashes the money. Then that budget is the basis of the tax cut that they are going to have us pass tomorrow, the next day, whenever they get it written. So that is going to cut the revenue available. And they are going to leave out of that tax cut several other important tax cuts that are necessary to make that tax cut work, so they are going to come back with a second tax cut bill, and then they are going so say, well, fine, we will agree to spend the money on clean coal as long as you take the money out of the Social Security Trust Fund.

Mr. Speaker, that is a nonstarter. There is no money in the budget for these conservation, research and renewable programs. The budget will be locked in with the tax bill, and there will be no money appropriated. That is perhaps why the White House needs to see blackouts, because in the light of day, there is an obvious contrast between telling people you are in favor of conservation and renewables and research and efficiency, and then, in the dark of night, passing the budget and tax bills that make it absolutely impossible to effectuate what you claim you want to do.

Ms. SANCHEZ. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman telling me that this tax cut that we are going to see voted on by the end of this week would really take away our ability to fund or put into the budget, really fund programs in the coming year, as we do our work, the programs that his slick booklet talked about? These booklets of energy, of fuel cell, these research and development programs for cleaner technologies? We know that his original budget coming here to us cut significantly, had a very paltry sum, and that when his administration, President Bush's administration said, cutting back on consumption is not really the way to do this, and people were upset that he did not look at conservation and new technologies; that he turned around and talked about these, but the reality is, his budget and the numbers that are reflected by that budget and what we have here is documents and working documents tells a different story.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what I am saying. We do not know what is in that tax bill. As I understand it, there is no Democrat in the room where the tax bill is being written, although they call it a conference committee. But we do know that when they emerge, one-third to one-half the benefits will go to income tax reductions to the wealthiest 1 percent of Americans. That is not in return for that group or any other group investing in clean coal or conservation; that is just a tax cut.

So while the President's plan calls for tax credits for conservation, for renewables, there is nothing in the tax bill that provides the tax credits that the President does the press conference about. That is why perhaps the real view of this administration, one that they have back-peddled from when it hit a fire storm, but their view was reflected in the comments well-known by the Vice President when he said, conservation may be a personal virtue, but it is not the sufficient basis for a comprehensive energy policy.

I think we need to respond. And that is, excessive energy company profits and environmental despoliation and destruction is not a sufficient basis for a comprehensive energy policy. What we need short-term for California are those rate regulations, and what we need in addition to some of the infrastructure improvements that the President talks about is a real dedication to conservation, to research, renewables, and "real" means you put it in the budget and you appropriate money for it. Not a real good pamphlet, but a real good law.

Ms. SANCHEZ. Mr. Speaker, being from California or going to New York or these research institutions where they are doing the research, these people are so optimistic, the researchers. They are looking at fuel cells and alternative fuels and different ways, rather than to use fossil fuel for the future. I mean, when we think of our country and this whole new technology and new economy that we are going through. I think if, in 1960, President Kennedy could say, we need to get a man to the moon and we could develop that technology that did that by July of 1969.

I am very familiar with that, of course, because it came out of the area that we represent, that certainly, with all of the new technology, with the research, if we just put money into that and let these people go at it, that in 5 or 6 years, we would completely change the type of energy that we use to run our cars and run our businesses and our homes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, if I can just add some of the statistics to back this up. Earlier we were talking about getting plants permitted. During the 8 years in which we had a Republican governor, we had zero plants permitted. Just in the last 2 years under a Democratic governor, 14 plants permitted, seven are under construction, four of them are going to be on line this summer, another four or five will be on line before we hit the problems of next summer. We will have 8,500 megawatts on line. That is moving forward.

But getting back to renewables and research, as I said, the budget put forward by the President cuts renewables and research and energy efficiency by about a third. We were talking about how successful energy conservation has been. Americans have saved 4 times more energy through efficiency, conservation and renewables over the last 20 years than has been produced from new sources, new finds, of fuel in the United States.

And Americans have saved $180 billion, I might have thought it was $200 billion earlier, $180 billion over the last 20 years. That is just because we are using less energy than we would have, because we have got this technology and that is saving $200 for every dollar that the United States has invested in developing these renewables, developing conservation systems. If we go up to a wildlife refuge and we drill for oil, we get the oil, we destroy the environment, and then the oil is gone. If we invest in the technology that allows us to use less oil, we use that technology this year and next year, the technology is never gone, the technology, if anything, is improved year after year. That is why if we are looking for a long-term solution, we cannot get it unless we have a real dedication, not just a press office dedication, to renewables, to conservation, and to research.

Ms. SANCHEZ. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from California for taking this hour to discuss and to dispel some of the myths that people around the country have heard about Californians and about what we are facing there. I hope that many of them will take the time to read the real information and to understand that where California goes, so does the rest of the Nation. I want to thank my colleague for the time given.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Orange County for participating in this special order. I think we have covered the subject well.

IMMIGRATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the Speaker's announced policy of January 3, 2001, the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. TANCREDI) is recognized for 60 minutes as the designee of the majority leader.

Mr. TANCREDI. Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening to talk about an issue that I care very much about and one I hope that will garner the attention of this House during the 107th Congress. It is an issue that is seldom discussed, unfortunately, although I consider it to be one of the most significant problems, one of the most significant issues facing the United States from a domestic policy standpoint, and that issue is massive immigration into this country. I hope that we can demonstrate tonight to everyone, to my colleagues and to those listening, the numerical realities of mass immigration and some of the burdens that come with it.

Mr. Speaker, since 1970 more than 40 million foreign citizens and their descendants have been added to the local communities of the United States of America. Just last month, The New York Times reported that the Nation's population grew by more in the 1990s than in any other decade in the United States history. For the first time since the 19th century, the population of all 50 States increased, with 80 percent of America's counties experiencing growth. Demographic change on such a massive scale inevitably has created winners and losers here in America. It is time that we ask ourselves, what level of immigration is best for America and what level of immigration into America is best for the rest of the world?

Now, as we have witnessed, Mr. Speaker, the previous speaker spent some time discussing the problems of energy in California specifically, or I should say the lack thereof. Of course this is a monumental problem facing the Nation. Something almost unbelievable is happening to us, a Nation, the richest Nation on the face of the Earth is now experiencing, in one of the richest States of that Nation, rolling blackouts, energy shortages. How can this be? The previous speaker had some idea as to why it occurred. But, of course, it is only a symptom, Mr. Speaker. All of the problems experienced by California and that will most certainly be experienced by other places around this Nation, the problem with not enough resources, not enough energy to supply the needs of the population, goes back to a much deeper root. It is not just the inability of the bureaucracy to move quickly for the approval of power plants or the number of companies that are transporting the product from place to place.

It is, in fact, numbers. It is people. California has experienced, as well as the rest of the Nation, an incredible increase in population over the last couple of decades. That population increase naturally forces all kinds of other things to occur: Great demands on our natural resources.

We wonder when we look around, all of us, is it not interesting that every single day as we come to work and we recognize how difficult it is, how many more cars there are on the road and how much longer it takes to get to work and we say to ourselves, gee, where are all these people coming from? Believe me, in Colorado, my home State, we are experiencing a dramatic, almost incredible growth rate. And where are these people coming from? Is it the natural growth rate of the population, the indigenous population of this country? No, sir it is not. It is, in fact, immigration, massive immigration, the size of which, the numbers we have never experienced before in this Nation's history.

Now, we have for a long time found it difficult to wrestle with this question of immigration. People are concerned about coming forward and actually debating this point. The reason, of course, is that there is always a taint associated with it. When you start talking about the problems of massive immigration, opponents of those of us who want to limit immigration always want to use race cards in the discussion. They always want to talk about this as being a racial issue. But I assure my colleagues, from my point of view, it has nothing to do whatsoever with race. It is simply a matter of numbers.

It is difficult to talk about it when we see nostalgic images of Ellis Island and we know that our own families, all of us here, have come to the United States, probably most of us, I should say, through that particular port of entry. We all recognize that that is our heritage. We all know someone, an immigrant who is here, who is struggling and striving to achieve the American dream, and we think about them nostalgically and we think about them as admirable people, and they are.

Mr. Speaker, I have absolutely nothing against those folks who come here, and I would be doing exactly the same thing if I were living in their condition, in their situation. I would be looking for the way to get into the country. But, in fact, we have a responsibility in the United States, and the Federal Government has a unique responsibility here. It is something the States cannot deal with on their own. We constantly fight this battle about what is the appropriate Federal role and the appropriate State role, but in this case with the issue of immigration, there is no question, it is a Federal role.

Only the Federal Government has the role and responsibility to establish immigration policy. And so it is only appropriate that we should be discussing this tonight, and I hope many more evenings and many more days on the floor of this House in the 107th Congress, because, Mr. Speaker, it is about time somebody brought this up. It is an issue that underlies so many of the things that we discuss here that are really in a way the veneer.

We just passed an education bill out of this House increasing the Department of Education's budget by some $20 billion to $22 billion. There was a lot of discussion about the need to build more schools. We are quite concerned about our Nation's schools, and we are forced to come here to the floor of the House of the United States Congress to deal with education which of course is not even in the Constitution as a role and function of this body. But we do it because the pressure is building out there across the land for something and somebody to do something because education is a problem.

Let me again suggest that one significant aspect of this education problem in America is massive immigration. In California alone, to meet the demands imposed upon that State by the massive number of people that are coming in there, immigrants, and, by the way, we are only so far talking about legal immigration. We are not even discussing for the moment the numbers of people who come here every single year illegally and actually stay here, become part of the population, do not return to their country of origin. I am just talking about legal immigration and the pressure that legal immigration puts on this country.

Specifically, the State of California would have to build a school a day for the next several years in order to meet the demands being placed upon it because of the population growth in that particular State. It is not unique. We are seeing this happen all over. These are tough questions but they can no longer be avoided, Mr. Speaker. As we enter the fourth decade of the highest immigration we have ever experienced in this country and we struggle with its impact, we must discuss it.

Some people express shock that Americans could consider cutting immigration and thereby violating what they claim to be the country's tradition of openness. But they truly misunderstand U.S. history. It is actually the high levels of immigration during the last three decades that have violated our immigration tradition. From the founding of the Nation in 1776 until 1976, immigration has varied widely but the average was around 236,000 people per year. Now, this was a phenomenal flow into any single country. It was unmatched by any country on the face of the Earth. It should be noted that during these times, the United States had vast expanses of virtually open land and was certainly much better able to handle 236,000 newcomers annually.

Then suddenly in the 1970s and 1980s at the very time the majority of Americans were coming to the conclusion that the United States population had grown large enough, due to changes in our immigration laws, immigration soared above traditional American levels, rising to an average of more than 500,000 a year. We averaged around 1 million a year during the 1990s. The cumulative effect of years of high immigration has taken a while for Americans to comprehend. But many have awakened to a rather startling realization that the unrelenting surge of immigration above traditional levels is changing their communities, changing communities throughout the United States into something oftentimes the residents do not like, do not recognize even as their own.

I am joined on the floor by my dear colleague and friend the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GOODE), who has I know some great concerns about the issue because he is a member of our caucus, a caucus we started last year called the Immigration Reform Caucus. I would like to now turn to the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Goode) for his comments on this issue and thank him very much for joining us this evening.

Mr. GOODE. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from Colorado for addressing immigration and for pointing out the figures that are impacting the Fifth District of Virginia and most every House district in this country.

One piece of legislation that I would like to see addressed by this Congress would establish English as the official language of the United States. I am not advocating that all in this country should speak English only. In fact, I would encourage all students to learn other languages. I have encouraged my daughter in her efforts to learn French and Spanish and to be fluent in both of those languages. We should try to learn other languages and other cultures, and I believe that our President is a stronger President because of his fluency in Spanish. But we need to have English as the language of this country. Having one common language is a unifying force for a nation. We will be stronger as a nation with one language which all persons in this great country share and which all could use in communicating with persons all across the United States.

We can avoid the Canadian situation. In Canada, they have held several referenda to break apart that country. The French-speaking Quebec province has sought several times to split from Canada. In the last referendum, there was a very close vote and the separatists almost prevailed. If we drift into a situation in this Nation where all persons in a region speak and use only a non-English language, then the separatist spirit may arise in the United States. I do not want to see a situation in this country develop like that in Canada.

By adopting English, we can avoid certain other problems. We can avoid the need to have multilingual highway signs. Can one imagine the cost on each State if we had to adopt multilingual signs. If all of our governments had to adopt forms and papers in the various languages, it would be a huge cost on the Federal Government and the individual State governments. We can prevent a separatist spirit from arising here by choosing English as our official language now.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. TANCREDO) for his focus on this important issue.

Mr. TANCREDO. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GOODE) for joining us this evening and for his comments. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GOODE) brings out a number of issues specifically related to the problems that we confront in the nature of when we have pressures brought in our schools to teach children in languages other than English, in our businesses to have forms in the language other than English, in our politics to go to the polls. At a time, there were probably half of the counties in Colorado that actually, by law, had to have ballots written in two different languages. There are still counties who do that. There are still places throughout the country that require that.

Now, let us think about what that really means. If, in fact, one cannot understand English, and at the point in time that one comes to vote, one has to be given a ballot in a different language, does that not mean that one is also most likely unable to understand the debate that occurred prior to the decision one makes to vote?

All of the discussion of the issues were inevitably in English. All of the candidates speaking, let us say 90 percent of the time anyway, were speaking and telling us their particular positions, their attitudes, their ideas in English. But if one cannot understand that, and one goes to the polls to vote, on what basis does one make these decisions if one cannot understand English and have to be given a different ballot?

But that is just one point that we have addressed this evening that I have mentioned before as being many faceted, many, many different problems that we confront as a Nation as a result of massive immigration.

Many Americans have awakened to a startlingly realization, Mr. Speaker; that is, that the unrelenting surge of immigration above the traditional levels, as I said earlier, is changing our communities and, as the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GOODE) mentioned, in ways that we find distracting.

The unprecedented flow of immigration has dramatically reshaped the social and ecological landscape all over America. None of this, none of this has been inevitable. Legal immigration into this country has quadrupled over the traditional American level for one reason and one reason only. Congress and the various Presidents for the last several years have made it happen.

I do not know if anyone ever intended for such an onslaught to take place when the immigration laws were changed in 1965, but for nearly three decades during various efforts to control illegal immigration, Congress has stood by as the much larger legal immigration numbers have soared and citizen opposition has risen correspondingly.

It is common when discussing negative trends from high mass immigration to focus on individual immigrant skills, education morals, their country of origin, culture and race. If one side points out that some immigrants are prone to crime and destructive behavior, the others note that most immigrants arrive with high motives, good character, and laudable behavior.

Some observers fear that the volume of nonEuropean immigration threatens to swamp America's cultural heritage. Others welcome an evermore multicultural society. Nonetheless, the chief difficulties that America faces because of current immigration are not triggered by who the immigrants are but how many they are. That is the point we have to focus on. It is the numbers.

The task before the Nation is setting a fair level of immigration, and it is not about race. It is not about some vision of a homogenous America. It is about protecting and enhancing the United States' unique experiment in democracy for all Americans, including recent immigrants regardless of their particular ethnicity.

It is time for us to confront the true costs and benefits of immigration numbers. They have skyrocketed beyond our society's ability to handle them successfully. These huge nontraditional numbers have led to many unwanted consequences.

Every single committee I sit on, the three committees I sit on, deal with some aspects of this. I am on the Committee on Resources, and almost every single hearing, we are confronted by the problems that the citizens of this country face when trying to actually even access on a recreational basis the beautiful places in this Nation that are available to them.

The other day, we were talking about Yellowstone National Park, and there is a great concern because of the numbers of people presently trying to visit that park every single year. We are talking about making reservations, having people make reservations to visit any of the national parks, sometimes years in advance because we cannot accommodate the numbers.

We are talking about what happens to the deserts of this country by the many people who are trying to exercise, again, their rights to recreate. We understand that. It is a constant balance, a constant tug of war between the desire to get out there and experience this great and wonderful land on the one hand and the recognition that the numbers of people that we have trying to do that will eventually lead to the complete elimination of those valuable resources. It certainly will lead to their almost immediate degradation.

Why? It is because of the numbers. Everything we face, it seems like every time we turn around in this Congress, we are faced with numbers. We keep looking at the symptoms. We try to figure out a way to allow people to get into the national parks and, like I say, making reservations for them years and years in advance and saying one can only use snowmobiles on certain trails, one can only walk on certain trails, one cannot drive one's car off the road here. We keep trying to figure out ways to contain the numbers of people.

What happens, of course, is that the quality of life declines for all of us, not just those who want to seek the pleasures of a pristine America, but those who live in cities where all of the services in that city, the demands for services grow astronomically, almost exponentially. The demands for schooling, the demands for sewage treatment facilities, the demands for streets and highways all grow beyond our ability to actually deal with them successfully because of the numbers.

The huge number of people that are coming into this country as immigrants have created for us a significant problem. There is another aspect of this. Mass immigration has depressed the wages of many an average American worker. Despite two decades of economic boom, the wages of our most vulnerable working Americans have remained relatively flat or even declined. This sorry recent record contrasts markedly with the rapidly rising wages of all Americans during the two decades after World War II.

Before 1965, the Congress wisely pursue a supplied-side labor policy of managed immigration that limited the number of immigrants to the traditional and historic level of around 200,000 a year.

During that age of managed immigration, tens of millions of Americans rose from poverty into the middle class. A supply-side labor policy demonstrably works. Mass immigration does not. To protect America's middle class and help more people at the bottom move up to the middle class, it is time to end America's experiment with mass immigration.

Immigration, massive immigration and the numbers that we are watching here has endangered American education. Children native-born and foreign-born are not achieving the educational standards that are certainly possible and necessary for them to eventually go on and get a slice of the American dream.

So these children are not only threatened by the depressed wages of many of their parents, but they are menaced by the decline of America's public schools. It is a decline not made because of immigration, but it is exacerbated by mass immigration.

The poverty level for America's children is growing, a phenomenon none of like to imagine. How can this be happening in the United States, in the richest country in the world?

Let us look specifically, if we look closer at the problem, as is so often the case with this issue, we see that it is in fact growing but growing among only a particular group of people. These are the children of immigrants, both legal and illegal.

Now, these problems that confront this country again, we will try to deal with here. We will pass massive budget increases. We have been doing it every single year for Health and Human Services. We will actually in 5 years, of course, double the appropriations for the National Institutes of Health, and I have voted for that.

I understand the concerns that we have and that we have to address it. But the reality is, where is this coming from? Why are we facing these problems in a way that has never before confronted the United States? I tell my colleagues, Mr. Speaker, I believe with all my heart it is the numbers.

I mentioned earlier that the massive overcrowding that is plaguing America's public schools can be blamed specifically, it goes directly back to immigration. Mass immigration also harms recent immigrants. It is the recent immigrants themselves who are most at risk on America's default on its commitment to a middle-class society. It is the children of recent immigrants, many of whom cannot speak English, whose future has been put at risk by the damage mass immigration has done to America's schools.

We hear more and more about a disturbing trend involving immigrants who cannot speak English holding society liable for their inability. The other day, I was reading an article in the Denver Post relating to a story that the ambulance drivers were being forced to hire a Spanish speaker to ride along to communicate with non-English speakers being treated by them, primarily, of course, illegal immigrants.

These teams felt obligated to retain these foreign speakers for one reason, to protect themselves from the rash of lawsuits being filed by non-English speakers against emergency medical teams who could not understand them when the ambulance arrived.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GOODE) alluded to another aspect of this where products being made, manufacturers of various products are being threatened with suits because their products were misused by the people who could not read the instructions in English that accompanied them.

According to the New York Times, the product liability consultants have begun to advise companies to provide warnings in foreign languages or that at least include Spanish on warning labels because "it may be thought to be necessary by some judges and juries in certain jurisdictions".

Mr. Speaker, with over 140 languages being spoken in America, the issue of warning labels leads down a very slippery path. How many are necessary? If one opens a box and cannot read the instructions or the warning label, how many languages should that be printed in, in order for one not to have the possibility of being sued?

How many street signs do we need to change into how many languages so that the people driving down the street will not sue the city if someone runs into them because they are going down the wrong way on a one-way street? But they say, hey, that sign was in English. I could not read it.

As bizarre as this sounds, as incredible as this sounds, this is happening. Police now are having to hire, not just medical teams, but police are having to hire these people to go with them also on their rounds.

Well, okay, maybe one can handle this. Maybe the cost of this can be borne by one's local community if one is just one language other than English that one has to be concerned about. But what happens when there is, in my own school district, when there are literally hundreds of languages that are being spoken?

How many people need to go with the cop to the door to answer the domestic dispute call? It could be in a variety of languages. Will they be held liable, will the police be held liable if they cannot understand the language of the person at the door?

There are other recent newspaper articles demonstrating the problems with and attendant to a massive immigration. Monday in the Denver Post was a printed story about just how overtaxed Americans enforcement mechanisms have become. In Durango, Colorado recently a group of illegal immigrants were detained in a motel because the Immigration and Naturalization service had no other place to hold them.

The illegal immigrants, of course, escaped out the window of their motel room, perhaps never to be seen again. But of course the numbers, again, these are the numbers we are talking about, massive, 1 million a year, legally. Then we add to that about another 300,000 or 400,000 who come here under a different category all together but still legally. Refugee status that is called. Some people estimate even double that number all together, 2- or 3 million that we gain every single year, net gain, of illegal immigrants.

And what does that do to all of the mechanisms that I have described here? Enforcement mechanisms that are at our Nation's border have become a farce. Another news outlet recently reported the Mexican government has begun providing "survival kits" to 200,000 people planning to head north illegally. The kits contain medicine, condoms, cans of tuna, granola, and information about crossing the desert. This is at a time when the Mexican government is telling the United States Government that they want to act to discourage illegal immigration.

But, Mr. Speaker, I put it to you that there is no desire whatsoever on the part of the government of Mexico or several other countries to discourage immigration because we are their safety valve. That border, an open border, is their safety valve. And, Mr. Speaker, it would be one thing if we only had to be concerned about the quality of life in Mexico, but it is also our responsibility to be concerned about the quality of life in the United States.

Now let us take a closer look at the demographic effects of these decades of mass immigration. From 1924 to 1965, approximately 178,000 immigrants annually are brought into the United States. At no other time in history was the country so positive about immigration or did immigrants assimilate so quickly or were they so welcomed.

In 1965, Congress changed the law. Democrats promised that our immigration numbers would not rise by more than 40,000 a year, but that quickly rose by hundreds of thousands a year, and Democrats have fought all efforts to correct the mistake. So during the 1990s, we averaged not 178,000 a year, but 1 million legal immigrants each year. That is why there is so much concern about immigration out there. It is not that everyone has turned mean-spirited and not that we have suddenly changed our minds about immigrants or the foreign born. It is just that the numbers have gotten so high at the very time most Americans had decided they wanted to stabilize the population like the rest of the world.

Now, there is actually quite a bit of ambiguity on the part of Americans on the topic of the population. Polls show that most Americans, when asked, like the immigrants they know. In general, they say they are hard-working and add some things to America individually. I would certainly say that if asked. But a majority also say there are simply too many.

I am now going to show something that I believe is most important in the context of understanding the immigrant issue that is before us. In fact, I do not believe any immigration decision should be made in this country without referring to this or how they relate to the charts I am going to show you. The chart in the well there is U.S. population growth since 1970 in millions.

In 1970, we had 203 million people in the country. A small number down there in the circle, left-hand side of the chart: 203 million. The green part of that chart represents the growth in U.S. population that lived here in 1970. You can see now that there was a baby boom. It is called on the chart the baby boom echo. So there was an increase in the number of people who lived here. Now, we are not talking about immigration, just indigenous population at that time, from 203 to 243 million people recently.

Around 1970, American people, through personal choices, decided to start having small families. As a result, we ended up with a fertility rate that was just below replacement level. We still had growth, because even though the baby boomers had small families, there were so many baby boomers that we kept on growing in population, but by less and less. Demographers have taken a look to see what the growth will be in the rest of the century from 1970-based American population.

As you can see from the green, the baby boom echo will add for a while and then actually, about 2030, it stops. That baby boom growth stops, and then it begins to recede back to the 1970 levels.

Now, does the green assume a zero immigration level? The answer is no. This is actually replacement level immigration. Because it assumes the same number of immigrants coming into the country as Americans are leaving it, at about, by the way, 200,000 a year. But look at the red on the left-hand side. It represents every immigrant above the replacement level who came here since 1970, plus their descendants, minus the death from both groups. Now, that means that there has been more population growth from immigration as there has been from natural growth from 1970 stock population.

So where it says 281 million, that is where we are now. And what it shows is the growth in the immigrant, the legal immigrant remember, legal immigrant population into the United States which matched the growth of this country naturally. That means that in this period of time since 1970 to today we have had to double all of the additional infrastructure expenditures we have had for the country. We have had to build twice as many schools, twice as many sewage treatment plants, twice as many roads and streets. All of this additional needs of this country have doubled because the Federal Government has quadrupled immigration.

Now, let us look at where we are headed according to the U.S. Census Bureau numbers. The Census Bureau tells us that this will be the future if immigration continues at today's rates. This is what we will bequeath to our children and our grandchildren this century. This is not conjecture, this is not speculation, it is not subjective, this is not what might happen, this is what will happen if Congress keeps immigration four times higher than traditional levels.

If Americans are feeling overwhelmed by congestion, the traffic, the overcrowded schools and the sprawl at this level, down there at the 2000 level, when you go to school, when you go to work every single day and everything around you, you see all the land being consumed, of what was yesterday a beautiful farm is today beginning to sprout houses, and what was a pasture not too long ago is now an industrial park, and you keep saying where is this coming from? I do not understand it. It is surprising because I just did not think the natural population of this growth of this country was creating this, well, you are right, it is not the natural population growth of the country that is creating it. It is the massive numbers of immigration of immigrants into this country, both legal and illegal, that is causing the problem.

Remember, this chart, the red you see on that chart, does not reflect illegal immigrants. It is just what would happen if we keep our immigration policy today at the same legal number. So if you think we are crowded today, if you think that it is harder and harder to find a place to go and recreate, harder and harder to get out to the mountains and get away from it all, to find a place where there is nobody around, and how many times have we wished we could be in that situation, just be alone for a while, when it is harder and harder to be alone for a while today, what do you think it is going to be like in 2050 or at the end of the century at these levels?

We have some of our coastal areas even today showing signs of societal breakdown, at this present level of immigration. As I started out with my whole discussion this evening, I was reflecting upon the previous speaker's concerns about California. Well, California is just a microcosm of where this Nation will be in the not-too-distant future. And not just in terms of its energy problems, but in terms of the population growth and all of the other problems that are attendant to massive population growth.

There are people who suggest that it is our responsibility to bring these people in because, of course, they are poor, they are impoverished, and we need to help them out. Please understand this. Even if we continued to take a million a year legally, we cannot even put a dent, not even the slightest dent into the world population of poor. Every single week, every single year, millions upon millions are added to the number of poor people in the world. And that is a terrible shame. Every year, 80 million. We take one. We are adding 80 million a year impoverished all over the world to the already 3 billion people who fit that category.

What can America do about that? How many can we take to make a difference? I suggest that if we truly wanted to be concerned about and show concern about the people in other countries, do not allow those governments off the hook, do not allow Mexico, for instance, to use the United States as their escape valve. Force them to deal with their problems internally. Force them to improve the quality of life for their own residents. That is the only way that we even can remotely hope to improve the quality of life for people around the world. We cannot do it by taking them in here. We will bring both ships down.

A lot of people wonder if immigration will be brought down to something in the more traditional level. Well, I do not have a crystal ball, but I can say that I believe the pressure for us to do something will grow, and I believe that this Congress will act. I do not know if it will be today. I hope it is today. But my gut tells me that it will not be. That it will be some time before we will ever have the courage to actually address this problem of immigration.

Let us be realistic about it, there are people in this body who look at this problem and look at this issue from political vantage points and suggest that massive numbers of people coming into the country will benefit one particular party over another. And it is, I suggest, their own very shortsighted, very political point of view that has prevented us in this body from doing anything about limiting going immigration now for some time. There is a political advantage to be gained by one party over another by having high levels of immigration. But look at what it is going to do to the rest of the Nation and to the immigrants themselves. It is not the best thing.

Massive immigration is not the best thing for immigrants, it is not the best thing for America. Do we act now, while we have the strength to help the rest of the world, or do we wait until years from now when we are in such a situation of disintegration and turmoil that we can only look inward? Do we cut the numbers now, while most Americans still have favorable feelings about the foreign-born Americans living with us? Those are the options we face as Americans. It is why it is urgent and important that every American make sure that their own Member of Congress is working towards something like this rather than what the majority is now doing, giving us something like that on the chart.

There are really two immigrant debates taking place in America today: the numbers debate and the characteristics debate. There are those who argue that we should either increase or decrease the total level of immigration and others who argue we should increase immigration based on the characteristics of the immigrants themselves. I believe that the second debate cannot take place independently of the first. After all, every immigrant that we admit to the United States has specific skills or good characteristics, and that contributes to a huge overall number of immigrants that I spoke of earlier.

I want my colleagues to understand I am not anti-immigrant. I am anti-mass immigration. I firmly believe that we must take overall numbers into account in any immigration debate and look at the impact of those numbers and how they affect our communities.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that we have begun the process even tonight of establishing a dialogue and a debate on this issue. It has for too long been held in secret even around the halls of Congress. For too long there has been a fear to address the issue of immigration for fear that people will attack those of us who are attempting to deal with it and use all kinds of spurious arguments against it.

I encourage us all to think about the need to once again gain control of our own borders, reduce the number to a level that is the more traditional level of 175,000 to 200,000 a year legally coming into this country and then try our best to deal with the illegals who are coming at a rate of 1 or 2 million into the country, a net gain to the country. We have to address it. The States cannot do it.

Mr. Speaker, it is our responsibility and ours alone. It is time to take that responsibility. Stand up, take the heat. There will be plenty of it. Mr. Speaker, I can guarantee that tomorrow, and probably tonight, the phones are ringing off the hook. The racial epithets; we have been through this before.

I am willing to take the heat and be called the names because I believe that this problem is a significant, perhaps the most significant, serious domestic problem we face as a Nation. Whether it is resource allocation, schools, buildings, hospitals, or just the quality of life, it is the numbers, Mr. Speaker. It is the numbers.

SENATE—Thursday, May 24, 2001

The Senate met at 10 a.m. and was called to order by the Honorable MICHAEL D. CRAPO, a Senator from the State of Idaho.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Dr. Lloyd John Ogilvie, offered the following prayer:

Gracious Father, Lord of the ups and downs of life, Lord of the seeming triumphs and supposed disappointments, Lord who does not change in the midst of change, we come to You for Your strength and Your power. Make us hopeful people who expect great strength from You and continue to attempt great strategies for You. Today especially, we ask You to fill this Chamber with Your presence and each Senator—Democrat, Republican, Independent—with Your special resiliency. Replenish our wells with Your peace that passes understanding. We claim Your promise through Isaiah—Fear not, for I am with you. Be not dismayed, I am your God. I will strengthen you; yes, I will help you; and I will uphold you with My righteous right hand. Amen.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The Honorable MICHAEL D. CRAPO led the Pledge of Allegiance, as follows:

I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

The assistant legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, DC, May 24, 2001.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, paragraph 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable MICHAEL D. CRAPO, a Senator from the State of Idaho, to perform the duties of the Chair.

STROM THURMOND,
President pro tempore.

Mr. CRAPO thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RESERVATION OF LEADER TIME

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, leadership time is reserved.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MAJORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming.

SCHEDULE

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, today the Senate will be in a period for morning business until 11:30 a.m., with Senators THOMAS and DURBIN in control. Following morning business, the Senate may begin consideration of any legislative or executive items available for action. The conference report to accompany the tax reconciliation bill is expected to be available no later than Friday. Therefore, we expect votes throughout the remainder of the week.

I thank my colleagues for their attention.

CONFERENCE REPORT PROGRESS

Mr. REID. Will the Senator from Wyoming yield?

Mr. THOMAS. Absolutely.

Mr. REID. I see the chairman of the Finance Committee. I ask him if we made progress on the conference.

Mr. THOMAS. The chairman is going to take a few minutes.

Mr. REID. The reason I say that, it is Thursday morning early, but we have already been getting calls on this side about people wanting to make parades on Saturday and things of that nature. I hope the Senator will be good enough this morning and during the day to keep us posted on how the conference is proceeding so we are better equipped to answer the phone calls we get.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the chairman of the Finance Committee.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GRASSLEY. I thank the distinguished Democratic leader for asking the question. I hope I can answer it. Remember, I have tried to conduct the work of the Finance Committee in a very transparent way and with open communication with everybody. So there will not be anything about this conference committee, except the specific negotiations, that will be kept from anybody.

Last night there were some—well, yesterday over the course of the afternoon and evening there were three informal meetings, and they are going to continue this morning, probably in just a few minutes. There have not been any decisions made yet, but the normal give and take that has to be done before settling down to serious negotiation is done and out of the way.

What I can best inform you about is that at the trail end of our visiting yesterday the Speaker of the House came to our meeting and he informed all conferees that he had instructed the House of Representatives that they would stay in session into the weekend until this conference report was adopted. That does not mean we have to be in on the weekend.

There has to be a realization that there has to be a slot of give and take. There is good spirit about the conference at this point, and we will just have to work our way through it. That is all I can tell the Senator. I will be glad to keep him informed anytime he wants to ask, and even if he does not ask, I know I have a responsibility to keep him informed, and I will try to do that.

MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of morning business, with Senators permitted to speak therein for not to exceed 5 minutes.

Under the previous order, the time until 10:45 a.m. shall be under the control of the Senator from Wyoming, Mr. THOMAS, or his designee.

The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, is the Senator from Wyoming finished?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

NOMINATION OF DAVID CHU

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I want to speak about something I have often spoken about in this Chamber. My colleagues have not heard me speak about this for a couple months. I try to follow on a very regular basis what is going on in the Defense Department because I want to make sure our defense dollars are spent wisely.

I come to this Chamber today to explain my opposition to a Department of Defense nomination. This is the nomination of Dr. David Chu to be Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness.

On Friday, May 18, I placed a hold on Dr. Chu's nomination. It happens that Dr. Chu is a very talented person. Those people who know him may wonder why I have some question about him filling this position because he is so highly educated, holding a Ph.D. from Yale University. He has a very impressive resume, and he has an extensive management and analytical background. He is currently vice president at the prestigious Rand Corporation.

In most ways, he is qualified for the position for which he has been nominated. I emphasize, he is qualified in most ways, but in a most important one—the matter of integrity—I am not 100-percent certain.

I have some unresolved questions about Dr. Chu's approach to telling it like it is—one might say his honesty. I am hoping these can be cleared up through negotiations.

My questions about Dr. Chu's integrity go back 20 years, I am sorry to say, to 1982, an incident I had that involved the Director of the Office of Program Analysis and Evaluation. This is commonly called PA&E—program, analysis, and evaluation.

PA&E was a very important office in the Pentagon in those days, and it was staffed with a very impressive cast of characters. It was set up in the 1960s to act as a devil's advocate for the Secretary of Defense.

PA&E was supposed to help the civilian Secretary of Defense separate the wheat from the chaff. PA&E was supposed to ferret out questionable programs and help the Secretary eliminate those that were not necessary.

From time to time, PA&E has to tangle with the brass at the Pentagon, and it took a very special person to do that. I think Secretary Rumsfeld is coming to grips with that very same problem right now.

Over the years, PA&E developed a reputation for being very hardnosed, but also being very smart. In the old days, PA&E put the fear of God in the hearts and minds of admirals and generals worried about their pet projects.

Over the years, PA&E earned a solid reputation and well-deserved respect. That is how it came to be known as the home for the famous Pentagon "whiz kids." One of the modern-day whiz kids is one I came to know quite well—Franklin C. Spinney, Chuck Spinney for short.

Chuck Spinney worked for Dr. Chu in PA&E's tactical air division, where he still works this very day. Chuck Spinney's immediate boss was Tom Christie. Tom Christie is another distinguished PA&E alumnus. President Bush has just nominated him to be the next Director of Operational Test and Evaluation.

Tom Christie deserves a lot of credit for protecting Chuck Spinney. He provided a sanctuary where Chuck Spinney could speak freely. He provided an environment where Chuck Spinney could do the kind of work that PA&E had always done. Unfortunately, this kind of work became increasingly unpopular during the Reagan defense build-up.

That's when I met Chuck Spinney—in the early stage of the Reagan defense build-up. I came to know him as the author of a very controversial report entitled "The Plans/Reality Mismatch."

The Plans/Reality Mismatch was an explosive piece of work. It was so explosive because it undermined the credibility of the Reagan defense build-up.

Chuck Spinney's Plans/Reality Mismatch set the stage for an unprecedented hearing held in February 1983. This was a joint hearing between the Armed Services and Budget Committees that was held largely at my request.

And Chuck Spinney, his Plans/Reality Mismatch, and stack of famous spaghetti charts were the centerpiece of the hearing. This was a hearing characterized by high drama. It was held in the Senate Caucus Room under the glare of television lights and intense media coverage.

Chuck Spinney gained instant notoriety as the "maverick Pentagon analyst." He appeared on the cover of the March 7, 1983 issue of Time magazine.

My questions about Dr. Chu's integrity grew out of Chuck Spinney's Plans/Reality Mismatch.

Leading up to the hearing, Dr. Chu withheld information about the Spinney report. He didn't tell us the whole story. He tried to keep it from me, Senator Gorton, and Senator Kassebaum.

Mr. President, that's the bottom line: Dr. Chu was not forthright and honest with me.

I laid out the entire matter in much greater detail in a letter I wrote to the chairman of the Budget Committee, my friend from New Mexico, Senator PETE DOMENICI.

My letter to Senator DOMENICI is dated January 19, 1995.

I wrote the letter because Dr. Chu was being considered as a possible Director of the Congressional Budget Office. I opposed his appointment to that position.

My letter about Dr. Chu has remained a closely guarded secret for the past six years. Until recently, only Senator DOMENICI had seen the letter—and no one else.

When I heard that Dr. Chu was being considered for a top-level post in the Pentagon, I shared the letter with the Director of White House Personnel. That was on March 8.

Clearly, the existence of this letter has caused some heartburn in both the White House and Pentagon. It has generated a number of phone calls to my office.

I continue to have strong reservations about Dr. Chu's nomination.

When I was contacted by the White House about Dr. Chu, I made my position crystal clear:

If Secretary Rumsfeld wants to make Dr. Chu the Under Secretary of Personnel and Readiness, then Secretary Rumsfeld will need a strong, independent Inspector General (IG).

That's my position on the Chu nomination.

One of the IG's toughest jobs is the investigation of allegations of misconduct by senior Pentagon officials. He will need a hard-nosed individual with plenty of hands-on experience to succeed at that job.

I don't see the Pentagon moving in that direction—yet.

Mr. President, I may have much more to say about Dr. Chu at a later date.

I yield the floor.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming.

SENATE BUSINESS

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I take a few minutes this morning to talk about a topic to which we will soon be moving. We have properly spent a good deal of time on the budget. We spent a good deal of time on taxes, although that is not finished yet. I congratulate the chairman on his excellent work on the tax bill. It sounds as if we will be able to present that to the President and successfully give tax relief to the American people.

We also have been heavily involved in education. We have not finished that area yet. We will soon be returning to it.

Those have been the most current topics and perhaps, indeed, among Members the most important topics.

There is another topic that is very important to everyone and one to which we are moving, and that is energy and energy policy. After having an energy policy, we will begin to implement that policy so we can make sure we can provide the necessary energy in a way that is careful and watchful about the environment. I think we can do this.

One of the important things that has happened is there is now an energy policy from the White House that will be open, of course, to great debate and great discussion in the Congress and in the whole country.

The fact is we have not had a policy on energy for a very long time. That is one of the reasons we find ourselves in the position we are in now. We have not looked ahead and we have not responded to the market messages that were sent in California. When we have consumption rising and production going down, there is a problem.

In the case of energy, as is the case of most other industries, it takes a good deal of time to implement some change. I am very pleased we are moving in that direction and we will continue to move. I applaud the President and Vice President CHENEY for the emphasis put by the White House on the energy issue and, specifically, the White House task force that completed its work in a rather short time. Of course, we have that energy package now. I think it will be the basis of our activities over the next several months, a very extensive booklet of issues pertaining to energy and the maintenance of our energy availability.

I applaud particularly the Vice President for working in this working group and including more than energy. The involvement of the Department of the Interior and the involvement of the Environmental Protection Agency are equally important, as in the involvement of the Energy Department itself. The things they do, the land they manage, the rules they promulgate certainly are as important as anything else that affects energy.

One of the real problems we have had is we have become more and more dependent on imported oil and foreign countries to produce what we need. Obviously, there will be an effort to increase domestic production. That is certainly the proper goal.

There has been some criticism that this study was not a public affair. However, the Vice President did talk to 265 different groups. This was not a public decisionmaking; this was the White House putting it out. How the Congress and the public will be involved. That is the proper way for the President to handle policy.

Chairman MURKOWSKI, from the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, to which I am member, has a broad bill that deals with many issues. There is a hearing going on as we speak, and the Secretary of Energy is talking to the committee about this report and his ideas for implementation.

The recommendations are extremely interesting and extremely important. Task force recommendations encourage fuel diversity—something we clearly need—and to utilize all of our domestic resources rather than relying on a particular resource. We need to talk about coal, which is now producing 52 percent of the electricity used in this country. Our reserves of coal are greater than probably any other fossil fuel. There is great opportunity for their use in the future.

There is also in this proposition, I think properly, a good deal of effort and money oriented towards continued developing technology and research in clean coal. I think that is something we ought to do.

There is also recognition and support for renewables, whether it is wind energy or solar energy or, in fact, hydro. We do that now. We have been working at that for some time. Frankly, renewables now produce only about 1 percent of our energy requirements but, nevertheless, there are opportunities for them to be a much larger part as we do research.

I come from the State of Wyoming. We have the highest coal production of any State and I think the largest resources of coal. We also have a considerable amount of wind and have some wind farms producing energy. Probably there will be a great deal more.

I remember, a number of years ago, a meeting in Casper, WY, on energy. This was 10 or 15 years ago. A speaker—I think from Europe—pointed out we have never run out of a fuel; we changed because we found one that was more efficient or more effective. We didn't run out of wood. We started using coal. We didn't run out of coal; we moved on to other things. I am confident we will move on, whether it is to hydrogen or solar or whatever, but I think we will be looking in that direction.

As we look at our automobiles and our travel plans for this holiday weekend, oil and gas has to be one of the things most important to us. Those volumes need to be improved. Our biggest problem at the moment is not crude oil amounts; it is really refining. We are up to 98 percent of capacity. So we need to do some things in that area.

I mentioned hydro. Along with that clean energy source, of course, is nuclear. Interestingly enough, most people do not recognize about 20 percent of our electric generation right now is nuclear. It is the most clean source, certainly of electric generation. It has difficulties. One of them is the waste, what to do with nuclear waste. We have been trying to deal with that for some time. We have the question of permanent storage out at Yucca Mountain, NV. We have spent billions getting into that place and have more to spend. We now find resistance from the State. They didn't resist spending the billions of dollars there, I might add. In any event, we have to do something there, perhaps take advice from France and Scandinavia, where they recycle this and have less waste than we do.

With Hydro, again, there are some paradoxes. Some of the environmental groups are critical if there is not enough emphasis on hydro but, interestingly enough, those are the same people who, a couple of years ago, were talking about tearing down the dams, the ones that generate the hydro. So there is always conflict in these things.

We have to take into account, on the economic end, environmental factors. We need to find a way to produce more clean energy and more secure energy in our future. So our strategy ought to be, and generally is here in this policy book, to repair and expand the Nation's antiquated infrastructure.

That is difficult. There is always a great deal of concern about electric transmission lines, of course. I suppose nobody really wants one in their backyard. On the other hand, if you are going to have electricity in California, you have to have a transmission line to get it there. We need to find a way to do that more expeditiously. We need to find a way to do that, frankly, with more respect for people's private property. The same with gas pipelines, we have to have an infrastructure to do that.

We are still often dealing with outdated equipment, particularly in the area of gasoline refineries. There have not been any new refineries built for a very long time, so the ones we have, of course, are old. There have been some rules from EPA that have made it difficult to upgrade refineries. They have the new source rule, which says if you make it more efficient, or update the old refinery, you have to meet the environmental standards of a new plant. That has discouraged upgrading the plants we have now.

Another thing we ought to be doing—and, again, it is in this report—is conservation. That is a choice you and I have to make. There is no question but what we can conserve. Look around your house. There are lots of times when we can be using less electricity than we are. The same is true, of course, with gasoline. We have to find more efficient use of this resource, and we can do that. I don't know if it always has to be a legislative question. I think we have some personal responsibility in that area of conservation.

Boost supply, of course, alternative sources, encourage new technology—those are things we can do and must do.

In the West, one of our greatest challenges is access to public lands and care for those public lands. In my State of Wyoming, about 50 percent of the State belongs to the Federal Government. In some States, it is even higher than that. I think Nevada is almost 86-percent federally owned lands. So there are rules and regulations about access to those lands. Indeed, there should be. But the fact is, they are a resource that belongs to the American people and there ought to be an opportunity for access to these lands for all kinds of uses, whether it is hiking, hunting, grazing, mineral exploration. I think we can do that in a way that is consistent with preserving these resources. Indeed, we should.

We have been developing energy for a very long time in Wyoming. For the most part, it has turned out quite well. We reclaim coal mines and the land recovers. When they are through, the land probably is more productive than it was before they started. You can see the deer and antelope come around to those places because there is more grass than there was before. We can do that.

We have to recognize there are different kinds of public lands. There is a great deal of difference between a national park, which is limited in its uses, and should be—we are not going to produce energy in Yellowstone National Park unless it is out of hot water or something; we are not going to do that and should not.

Wilderness—wilderness is set aside for singular uses. But most of the public land in Bureau of Land Management land that was never set aside for anything. It was there. It was there after they closed down the Homestead Act and these lands were unclaimed so they became Bureau of Land Management lands. They are available, in my view, and in most cases they are for multiple uses. We need to ensure that is happening.

However, since 1983, access to mineral reserves in the West has declined by about 65 percent. Less than 17 percent of the total mineral estate is leased as compared to 72 percent in 1983. I do not suggest we return to that, but we do have to take a look at accessibility. We have to take a look at good environmentally sound ways of exploring and extracting minerals. We can do that. The Bush-Cheney plan addresses this problem. Not only how to do it, but it talks about renewables. It talks about the environment and issues we need to talk about.

We have a great deal to do, but we have some great opportunities to do it. Here are a few of the things that are in the Bush-Cheney national energy policy. We help consumers in the short run. We increase LIHEAP funding to $1.7 billion. LIHEAP is for low-income people whose home energy bills went up. We double the weatherization funding, work with Governors to encourage regional energy planning, and work with FEMA so the emergency agency can respond to energy emergencies.

There is a good deal of emphasis on conservation, increasing efficiency. Indeed, it is made a national priority in this book.

We need to expand DOE's appliance standards programs to make standards higher. We need to take a look at the mileage standards on vehicles, and this plan provides incentives for fuel-efficient technologies. These things are all in this plan, and I think are a very important part of it.

We need to increase the supply of conventional fuels. We can do that. I know there is great controversy about ANWR. Whether or not we end up in ANWR is not the issue; the issue is whether there is access to those lands that should be available for exploration and production. There are a great many of those lands. We have already extensive gas production. We need to increase the infrastructure there and have a natural gas pipeline; provide royalty relief for deep water and enhance that recovery, as well as low production wells. We can do that which would increase considerably production of energy here.

There are a lot of things to do. We need to extend renewables and alternative fuels. This is a good one. As I mentioned, it currently only produces less than 2 percent—a little over 1 percent—of the total, but it has the potential to do a great deal more. And it is very clean energy. That is what a lot of people would like to do.

It streamlines the hydroelectric licensing process. It expands tax credits, again, for the production of electricity from renewable sources.

We hear from environmentalists that all that is talked about is more production of oil. That is not true. This book contains all these areas, with a considerable amount of emphasis on conservation, and with a considerable amount of emphasis on renewables. So we can do that.

Obviously, one of the difficult things to do is strengthening and increasing the infrastructure so we can move energy. There is a good deal of talk in my State, again, about mine mouth generation. It is very efficient. But then you have to move it. You have to move it on a transmission line or a gas pipeline. We can do that. I think we have done some research to reduce the line loss that is in that kind of transportation. But that is probably our most available source of electric generation. It needs to be moved to where the market will be. We can do that.

There needs to be a considerable amount of work done on refining. One happy thought is that there is a surplus of gas that is beginning to build up. I think we see a leveling off of the price. I met with some refiners the other day, and they say there is likely to be a turnaround here, probably after this weekend. It will not be a great rush, but we will see it at least not move up as it has in the past.

Finally, I am a strong proponent of the environment. I grew up in a place right outside Yellowstone Park, where the environment is very close. In our plan, as we look forward to where we want this country to be in the next 20 years, in the next 50 years, we need a strong economy. And if we want a strong economy, we need jobs.

We also need energy so we can provide for this economy and do the things we need to do, which includes the military and military defense. At the same time, we want to have an environment with a certain amount of open space protecting this environment so that we end up preserving the mountains in Teton Park, so that we end up preserving the open spaces in Nevada, so that we end up preserving the trees and the mountains and the hills in Vermont because those are very close to all of us and very important.

So I think we have a great opportunity now. We have to move quickly because it is something that affects everyone. And it is starting to affect us now, of course.

There is always this question of needing to do something today. We need to put in price caps. We need to do this. It is very difficult. Obviously, price caps have not been an asset in terms of causing things to happen over the long term, to cause investments to take place so that we do solve the problems.

We took oil out of SPR, out of storage last time, and it had no overall impact. So we are going to have to sit down, probably look for conservation in the short term, and take a look at what we can do with infrastructure, with sources to develop our fuels for the future.

I think we have a great opportunity to do that. We have guidelines for doing it in President Bush's and Vice President CHENEY's national energy policy.

VETERANS OPPORTUNITIES ACT OF 2001

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Veterans' Affairs Committee be discharged from further consideration of H.R. 801 and that the Senate then proceed to its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHAFEE). Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will report the bill by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 801) to amend title 38, United States Code, to improve programs of educational assistance, to expand programs of transition assistance and outreach to departing servicemembers, veterans, and dependents, to increase burial benefits, to provide for family coverage under Servicemembers' Group Life Insurance, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

AMENDMENT NO. 790

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, Senators SPECTER and ROCKEFELLER have an amendment at the desk, and I ask for its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Wyoming (Mr. THOMAS), for Mr. SPECTER, for himself and Mr. ROCKEFELLER, proposes an amendment numbered 790.

(The text of the amendment is printed in the RECORD under "Amendments Submitted and proposed.")

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I have sought recognition to comment on the "Veterans' Survivor Benefits Improvement Act of 2001," a measure which I ask be approved by the Senate as a substitute amendment to H.R. 801. H.R. 801 is a bill which was passed by the House of Representatives on March 27, 2001, and subsequently referred to the Senate Committee on Veterans' Affairs. In my capacity as Chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, I am pleased to offer this amendment with my colleague, the Ranking Member of the Committee, Senator ROCKEFELLER.

In keeping with the spirit of the upcoming Memorial Day holiday—a day intended to memorialize the service of those who lost their lives while in service to the Nation—the Veterans' Survivor Benefits Improvements Act of 2001 would retroactively increase insurance benefits provided to, and guarantee additional health coverage for, the survivors of service members killed in the line of duty. The Act would also expand health care coverage to the spouses of veterans who have permanent and total disabilities due to military service, as well as the spouses of veterans who have died as a result of wounds incurred in service. Further, the Act extend life insurance benefits to service members' spouses and children, and would authorize, and direct, the Department of Veterans Affairs to conduct outreach efforts to contact these survivors, and other eligible dependents, to apprise them of the benefits to which they are entitled. Finally, the Act would make technical improvements to Montgomery GI Bill education benefits, and make other purely technical amendments to title 38, United States Code.

As part of the "Floyd D. Spense National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2001" (Public Law 106-398), Medicare-eligible military retirees and their spouses became eligible for lifetime health care coverage under the Department of Defense (DOD) TRICARE program. Under the new law, TRICARE acts as a "Medigap" policy, paying for those health care services, such as prescription drugs, not covered under Medicare. Prior to enactment of Public Law 106-398, military retirees lost TRICARE eligibility upon becoming eligible for Medicare.

Mr. President, we can do no less for the survivors of service members who have died wearing our Nation's uniform than we have already done for spouses of military retirees. Therefore, Section 3 of the Act—building on legislation introduced by Senator ROCKEFELLER (S. 564) and consistent with the principles set out in the "TRICARE-for-life" program expansion for military retirees—would extend lifetime health coverage under the Civilian Health and Medical Program of the VA (CHAMPVA) program. That program—similar to TRICARE—provides medical services to the surviving spouses of service members who died while on active duty, to the surviving spouses of veterans who died after service from injuries sustained while on active duty, and to the spouses of veterans who have survived service but who had service-related injuries which are permanent and total in nature.

Under the Act—similar to provisions applicable under the TRICARE expansion enacted in Public Law 106-398—CHAMPVA benefits will be extended to spouses even after they gain Medicare eligibility, and CHAMPVA will pay for what Medicare does not. Full CHAMPVA benefits will be extended to eligible survivors who were eligible for Medicare on the date of enactment, and for those survivors who became Medicare-eligible after enactment, full CHAMPVA benefits will be extended upon enrollment in Medicare Part B.

As part of the "Veterans Benefits and Health Care Improvement Act of 2000"

(Public Law 106-419), signed into law on November 1, 2000, Congress authorized an increase, from $200,000 to $250,000, in the maximum amount of Servicemembers Group Life Insurance (SGLI) coverage available to participating service members. However, Congress did not make the increased maximum death benefit effective until April 1, 2001. Sadly, the Nation's Armed Forces have suffered a series of tragic losses over the past several months. From the terrorist attack on the U.S.S. Cole on October 12, 2000, to the accidental bombing of our own service members in Kuwait on March 12, 2001, many brave Americans have lost their lives in defense of freedom during the period between enactment and the effective date of these increased benefits. As a symbol of gratitude to the survivors of those killed in the performance of duty, section 5 of the Act would allow retroactive application of the increased SGLI amount for those service members who died in the performance of duty between October 1, 2000, and March 31, 2001, and who had the maximum amount of available SGLI coverage in effect at the time of death. This would amount to a $50,000 payment for eligible beneficiaries, a small token of thanks for a sacrifice so large. I thank my colleague from Virginia, Senator WARNER, who authorized the legislation (S. 546) from which this provision was derived.

Another provision in the Act would enhance SGLI benefits for the spouses and dependent children of active duty service members. The provision would permit service members to purchase a maximum of $100,000 in SGLI coverage for their spouses and would extend $10,000 of life insurance coverage automatically to their children. These added enhancements to the SGLI program are common features provided by many commercial policies; they should be made available to our fighting men and women. A similar provision was approved by the Senate during the 106th Congress, but was not acted upon by the House.

In order to ensure that veterans' family members are made aware of the various VA benefits to which they are entitled, section 6 of the Act authorizes and instructs VA to conduct enhanced outreach efforts to veterans' spouses, surviving spouses, children, and dependent parents. The Act also specifies that such efforts are to be undertaken with the use of the internet, media, and veterans' publications to reach as wide a beneficiary audience as possible. Awareness of available benefits is critical if VA is to meet its statutory responsibilities.

Lastly, the Act makes several technical improvements to the Montgomery GI Bill (MGIB) education program. The first improvement would clarify eligibility requirements for MGIB benefits. Current law, as amended under the "Veterans Benefits and Health Care Improvement Act of 2000" (Public Law 106-419), could be interpreted as requiring more active duty service than is actually necessary to qualify for MGIB benefits. The clarifying language removes any ambiguity as to the service obligation required for eligibility.

A second improvement would change the method by which a veteran's MGIB entitlement is charged in cases where an active duty service member uses a portion of his or her MGIB benefit entitlement during service to supplement costs not covered under Tuition Assistance Reimbursement programs run by the armed service branches. The new method would be simpler for VA to administer, easier for veterans to understand, and more beneficial for a veteran wishing to maximize his or her utilization of the MGIB benefit.

A third improvement would simplify administration of the new MGIB "buy-up" opportunity created by the "Veterans Benefits and Health Care Improvement Act of 2000" (Public Law 106-419). Under that law, a service member who contributes up to $600 while in service may receive an additional $150 per month in additional monthly MGIB benefits for a total of 36 months. The improvement would set minimum monthly in-service contribution amounts of $20 and would limit the frequency of contributions to once per month. DOD requested these modifications to ensure the smooth and efficient operation of the "buy-up" program.

A fourth improvement would clarify and extend current provisions of law providing for the reimbursement of contributions made to secure eligibility for MGIB benefits in cases where the service member has died before he or she could utilize those benefits. Current law neglects to specify explicitly that the reimbursement provision applies in certain circumstances. This provision remedies that oversight.

Finally, a fifth improvement would clarify that service members who wish to convert from Veterans Educational Assistance Program (VEAP) benefits to MGIB eligibility—an option made possible by a provision of the "Veterans Benefits and Health Care Improvement Act of 2000" (Public Law 106-419)—need only contribute $2,700 to exercise that option. Due to a drafting error, current law could be read as requiring that a servicemember interested in converting pay $3,900, an additional contribution amount that was not intended.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support the adoption of the "Veterans' Survivor Benefits Improvement Act of 2001." In doing so, we honor the memories of our fallen heroes by providing for those loved ones left behind. I yield the floor.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, I am very pleased that the Senate is considering the Veterans' Survivor Benefits Improvements Act of 2001.

It is fitting that we will enact this bill in time to commemorate Memorial Day, the day we, as a nation, remember and pay tribute to the brave members of the American military who died to ensure our freedom. That is why the theme of the bill is especially appropriate. Although not broad in scope, H.R. 801 attempts to improve the ways in which we relate to the survivors of servicemembers and veterans, the families of those who have sacrificed so much for their country.

I am enormously pleased that the bill before us contains my legislation to extend health care protections to CHAMPVA beneficiaries over the age of 65.

Last year, Congress finally enacted legislation to restore the promise of providing lifetime health care to military retirees, by allowing military retirees to retain coverage through TRICARE, rather than having to shift to Medicare at age 65. TRICARE for Life, as it is known, was a great benefit for retirees, but CHAMPVA beneficiaries were not included in this new benefit.

The Civilian Health and Medical Program of the Department of Veterans Affairs, CHAMPVA, provides health care coverage to several categories of individuals: Dependents of veterans who have been rated by VA as having a total and permanent disability; survivors of veterans who died from VA-rated service-connected conditions; and survivors of servicemembers who died in the line of duty. As such, CHAMPVA provides a measure of security to a group of persons who have undeniably already sacrificed a great deal for our country. Under current law, CHAMPVA beneficiaries lose their eligibility for coverage when they turn 65 and have to shift to Medicare.

The TRICARE for Life law passed last year specifically allows military retirees and their dependents to remain in the TRICARE program after they turn age 65, as long as they are enrolled with Part B of Medicare. TRICARE will cover those expenses not covered under Medicare; it also provides for retail and mail-order pharmaceutical coverage for Medicare-eligible military retirees.

Title 38, United States Code, reflects the view that TRICARE and CHAMPVA should operate in similar ways. However, with the enactment of TRICARE for Life, that linkage was broken and a modification in law is needed to make CHAMPVA consistent with TRICARE.

The provisions in this bill simply clarify that the CHAMPVA and TRICARE programs should continue to operate in a similar manner, with similar eligibility. This would mean that Medicare-eligible CHAMPVA beneficiaries who enroll in Part B of Medicare would retain secondary CHAMPVA coverage and receive the same pharmacy benefit as CHAMPVA beneficiaries who are under age 65.

The failure of Congress to enact prescription drug coverage under Medicare only magnifies the need to enact this CHAMPVA reform. Incredible advances in drug therapy, combined with staggering inflation in prescription drug costs, have made the need for affordable prescription drug coverage absolutely critical. CHAMPVA beneficiaries who have sacrificed so much already should not be forced to forego other necessities of life to purchase needed prescription drugs.

I recently heard from a couple from Alderson, WV, who represent a classic example of why this legislation is so necessary. The husband is a veteran of the Korean war. They wrote to me when they learned that the wife lost all of her CHAMPVA benefits when she turned 65. As a result, she was forced to pay more than $300 per month for her diabetes and heart medications, in addition to all the other new costs for care not covered by Medicare. With Social Security and disability compensation as their only income, this couple is struggling to absorb this enormous new expense in their modest budget. My bill would relieve them of that burden.

I thank the Gold Star Wives Association and the Consortium for Citizens with Disabilities for their dedication in bringing this issue to my attention. We must never forget that the costs of military service are borne not by the servicemember alone, but by their families as well.

Section 4 of H.R. 801 addresses a shortcoming in the current insurance coverage provided to servicemembers, the Servicemembers' Group Life Insurance, SGLI. Currently, dependents, spouses and children, are not eligible for insurance coverage under the servicemember's policy and must secure outside commercial coverage. This bill would extend coverage to dependents, giving great peace of mind to servicemembers with many other worries as they train and prepare for deployment, and especially when they are sent into harm's way.

Servicemembers can elect to participate in a VA-administered group life insurance program, SGLI. Government insurance for servicemembers was created in 1917 to provide insurance to soldiers going off to war, because they were unable to purchase commercial life insurance that would cover death resulting from an act of war. That need still exists today.

Coverage is available in $10,000 increments up to a maximum of $250,000 unless the servicemember declines coverage or elects coverage at a reduced amount. Veterans can opt to continue

VA insurance, VGLI, after leaving the service, although generally the rates are not as competitive as commercial policies. As of last September, the SGLI premium was $.08 per month per $1,000 of coverage, and there was 2,307,000 SGLI policies in force. However, there is no VA or DoD sponsored insurance for the families of these servicemembers, who are often overseas, which makes securing U.S. commercial insurance difficult.

Last year, the Senate passed S. 1810, which would have provided an opportunity to provide similar coverage to spouses and children to SGLI-insured servicemembers. The House did not accept this provision in conference, and it was dropped from the final omnibus veterans bill.

This year, the House passed a provision that essentially mirrors last year's Senate provision to allow coverage for dependents. Dependents' coverage would be automatic unless it is declined. The amount of coverage for a spouse would be equal to the coverage of the insured servicemember, up to a maximum of $100,000. The lives of a covered servicemember's dependent children would be insured for $10,000. Premiums are to be set by VA to cover the costs of providing the insurance coverage.

Section 5 of H.R. 801 also addresses an apparently small discrepancy that may make a great difference in the lives of some servicemembers' survivors. In Public Law 106-419, Congress increased the maximum coverage for servicemembers' group life insurance from $200,000 to $250,000, but delayed the effective date to the "first day of the first month that begins more than 120 days after the date of the enactment of [this] Act." The bill was signed by the President on November 1, 2000.

However, between passage of the law in Congress and the prospective implementation of the increase, the nation has been shocked by several high profile incidents resulting in loss of servicemembers' lives, such as the tragic bombing of the U.S.S. Cole.

This provision would make the increase retroactive back to October 1, 2000, to cover those servicemembers who died in the line of duty in the last several months. There are no costs associated with this provision, nor will there be any increase in premiums to the insured. It is simply the right thing to do for our men and women in uniform.

Finally, section 6 of H.R. 801 would require VA to expand outreach efforts to veterans' dependents and survivors, by requiring the Secretary of Veterans Affairs to ensure that the availability of services and assistance for eligible dependents is made known through a variety of means, including the Internet, announcements in veterans' publications, and announcements to the media.

The most recent survey conducted by VA indicated that less than half of the veterans contacted were aware of certain benefits they were entitled to receive. For survivors of veterans, there is even a lower level of awareness. Currently, VA is mandated to perform outreach to servicemembers and veterans, but not to eligible dependents, a spouse, surviving spouse, child, or dependent parent of a person who served on active duty.

It is critical that we reach out to these survivors and dependents. They should know that VA has many services to assist them in the difficult time following a servicemember's death and in transitioning through that period with insurance, compensation, education, and health care.

In closing, I urge all my colleagues to support H.R. 801 as a tribute to our deceased servicemembers, not just on the day we have selected to honor them, but on every day throughout the year.

CHANGING SENATE LEADERSHIP

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. President, this is a historic day in the Senate. The announcement this morning by Senator JIM JEFFORDS of Vermont that he is going to become an Independent and organize the Senate with the Democratic caucus means a change in leadership in this important institution of government. It is not the first time that a Member of the Senate has changed political parties. I reflected as I came to the floor that there were four Members on the Republican side who were formerly Democrats at some point in their career. Senator THURMOND was a Democrat from South Carolina and made a decision to become a Republican, I believe, in the 1970s. Senator PHIL GRAMM was a Democratic Congressman from Texas who changed his party allegiance and ran for reelection before he was elected to the Senate as a Republican. Senator BEN NIGHTHORSE CAMPBELL switched parties from Democrat to Republican and now sits on the Republican side. In addition, Senator RICHARD SHELBY of Alabama made the same transition from Democrat to Republican.

Of course, it is different in this circumstance in a 50/50 Senate. Any change of party has historic consequences. The decision of Senator JEFFORDS to organize with the Democratic caucus means there will be a rather substantial change in terms of the leadership of the Senate.

For the last several months, since the election of President Bush, many have given speeches and made statements about the need for bipartisanship. Now we will be put to the test if we have a Democrat-organized Senate, a Republican House, and, of course, a Republican in the White House. Literally, the agenda for the country and the fate of our country will be in the hands of bipartisanship. I think we can rise to that challenge. I hope we will.

I have the greatest confidence in the man who will be the Democrat majority leader, TOM DASCHLE of South Dakota. I have worked with him for almost 20 years in public life, in both the House and the Senate. He is not only very talented; he is an honest person, as hard working as any Member of this Chamber, and his word is good. President Bush, as well as Speaker HASTERT, I am sure, will find him to be an excellent person with whom to work.

I also hope we can develop a common agenda, a bipartisan agenda for the Senate. We have dealt with important budget and tax matters. There are other issues that need to be resolved, not just the 13 spending bills that fund our Federal Government but important issues which, frankly, have not received the attention they deserve. One of those is the Patients' Bill of Rights, to make certain the families across America can have peace of mind that they can go to the best doctors and the best hospitals and rely on medical decisions being made by medical professionals rather than by insurance company clerks. Too often, good medical decisions are being overridden by those who work for insurance companies who have a profit motive in mind rather than the best interests in a person's health. I think a Patients' Bill of Rights should be high on our agenda.

Second, of course, we will move into the area of education. This is an area we were debating before the tax bill arrived, and that most Americans agree is absolutely critical to the future of our country. We have to make a commitment in our agenda to public education and the education of all children across America. The schools of today face extraordinary challenges which my generation could not have even imagined. Children are coming to school now with greater problems than they have had in the past, and we are expecting more out of the school in terms of training and education than we ever did in the past. We have to make the investment in quality teachers and accountability, in safe classrooms, in modern classrooms, and technology so our kids have a fighting chance to lead America into the 21st century. That should be high on our list of priorities.

In addition to that, the President has asked us to look at questions related to energy. That is an important issue in my home State of Illinois where people have gone from recordbreaking heating bills because of the cost of natural gas to the recordbreaking cost for gasoline at the pump. It is important to not only find new sources of energy that are environmentally sound and make certain they are delivered to the people who need them but to also talk about conservation, a responsibility that is not only one we have as individuals but as the Government. We have to do our part as consumers to buy more fuel-efficient vehicles. Government has to do its part to encourage Detroit to catch up with Japan which already has these duel-use, duel-energy vehicles on the street that are in great demand. Unfortunately, Detroit has not come up with an alternative to compete. They should.

In addition, we have to look at the marketplace for energy in America. Some people think it is simply a supply-and-demand market. It is hard to imagine there is real competition of supply and demand when you drive around Chicago or Springfield, IL, and see all of the prices at the gasoline stations going up in lockstep and coming down, trickling down, in lockstep to believe there is real competition. It is hard to find anybody who is selling at a low price in order to entice consumers.

Sadly, despite the high energy prices and the fact some say it is a market situation, these energy companies are having the highest profits in many years. It is one of the industries that can guess wrong for consumer demand and make higher profits. That is something that has occurred.

We also need to address the question of the minimum wage for workers across America. There was a tax bill passed yesterday that leaves behind over 70 million Americans who do not get a reduction in their tax rate, those at the 15-percent rate, the lowest rate, and those are the same people in many cases who are working for a minimum wage. We have not touched the minimum wage in years in this country.

We have in my State over 400,000 people who go to work every single day at the minimum wage. If we are serious about giving mothers and fathers more time at home with their kids so they can have some leisure time and an opportunity to work with their kids on education, taking a look at the minimum wage is an important element so they don't have to work two or three jobs to try to make ends meet.

There is an important agenda ahead of us. I have touched on only a few items I hope we will consider. Now that we have this change in leadership in the Senate, it is important we address it on a bipartisan basis. It is a unique day in the history of the Senate. It is a unique challenge to all to rise above partisanship and put our country first.

I yield the floor and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. BUNNING). Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, on behalf of the majority leader, TRENT LOTT, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess until the hour of 1 o'clock.

There being no objection, at 12 noon, the Senate recessed until 1:02 p.m., and reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. BUNNING).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In my capacity as a Senator from Kentucky, I suggest the absence of a quorum. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. LOTT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed in executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NOMINATION OF THEODORE BEVRY OLSON, TO BE SOLICITOR GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES—MOTION TO DISCHARGE

Mr. LOTT. Mr. President, pursuant to the provisions of S. Res. 8, I now move to discharge the Judiciary Committee of the nomination of Ted Olson, to be Solicitor General of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the provisions of S. Res. 8, the motion is limited to 4 hours of debate, to be equally divided between the two leaders.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. President, I note that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Senator HATCH, is here and ready to proceed. Therefore, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, as you know, we have been trying to make sure that the Justice Department has its full complement of leaders because if there is a more important Department in this Government, I don't know which one it is. There may be some that would rate equally but that Department does more to help the people of this country than any other Department.

One of the most important jobs in that Department is the Solicitor General's job. The Solicitor General is the attorney for the people. He is the attorney for the President. He is the attorney for the Department. He is the attorney who is to argue the constitutional issues. He is the attorney who really makes a difference in this country and who makes the primary arguments before the Supreme Court of the United States of America.

In addition, he has a huge office with a lot of people working to make sure this country legally is on its toes.

In the case of Ted Olson, I am very pleased that we are able to have this motion up at this time. I am pleased that we have colleagues with good faith on the other side who are willing to see that this is brought to a vote today because we should not hold up the nomination for the Solicitor General of the United States of America.

We have had all kinds of Solicitors General. We have had some who have been very partisan but have been great Solicitors General, and we have had some who have hardly been partisan at all and have been weak Solicitors General. We have had some not very partisan at all who have been great Solicitors General. You would have to make an analysis yourself to determine how your own personal philosophy fits.

But in terms of some great ones, there was Archibald Cox, who was never known for conservative politics. He was not very partisan by most Republicans' standards, but he turned out to be an excellent Solicitor General of the United States. We could go on and on.

But let me just say this, that it is interesting to me that Ted Olson has the support of some of the leading attorneys and law professors in this country who have the reputation of being active Democrats.

Let me just mention a few. And I really respect these gentlemen for being willing to come to bat for Ted Olson. Laurence Tribe, the attorney for former Vice President Gore, in Bush v. Gore, on March 5, 2001, said:

It surely cannot be that anyone who took that prevailing view—

He is referring to Bush v. Gore— and fought for it must on that account be opposed for the position of Solicitor General. Because Ted Olson briefed and argued his side of the case with intelligence, with insight, and with integrity, his advocacy on the occasion of the Florida election litigation, as profoundly as I disagree with him on the merits, counts for me as a plus in this context, not as a minus. If we set Bush v. Gore aside, what remains in Ted's case is an undeniably distinguished career as an obviously exceptional lawyer with an enormous breadth of directly relevant experience.

I have known Laurence Tribe for a long time. I have a great deal of respect for him. I do not always agree with him, but one time he asked me to review one of his books. Looking back on that review, I was a little tough on Larry Tribe to a degree. But I spent time reading his latest hornbook just this last week, read it through from beginning to end—I think it was something like 1,200 pages—it was very difficult reading, and I have to say I came away after reading that hornbook with a tremendous respect for the legal genius of Larry Tribe.

Although I disagree with a number of his interpretations of constitutional law, there is no doubt about the genius and effectiveness of this man, and I think it is a tribute to him that he was willing to stand up for Ted Olson and write it in a letter.

Walter Dellinger is the former Clinton Solicitor General. He is one of the great lawyers of this country. He is a liberal and some thought he was extremely partisan, although I questioned that personally, just like I questioned those who say Ted Olson is partisan. No question that Walter Dellinger is a very strong and positive Democrat, a very aggressive Democrat. But he also is a man of great intelligence and integrity.

On February 5, 2001, Mr. Dellinger said that when Olson served in the Justice Department as the head of the Office of Legal Counsel, he "was viewed as someone who brought considerable integrity to the decisionmaking."

Virtually everybody who worked with Ted Olson at the Office of Legal Counsel—in fact, all that I know of—said he was a man of integrity who called them the way he saw them, who abided by the law and did not allow partisan politics to enter into any thinking. There are two offices where partisan politics could work to the detriment of our country.

One is the Office of Legal Counsel, which he handled with distinction, with ability, with fairness, in a nonpartisan way. The other is the Office of the Solicitor General, which I assert to this body he will handle in the same nonpartisan way. He will certainly try to do what is constitutionally sound and right. And he will represent the Congress of the United States in these battles. He may not always agree with the Congress of the United States when we are wrong, but you can at least count on him doing what is right and trying to make the best analysis and do what he should.

Now, Beth Nolan is a former Clinton White House counsel and Reagan Department of Justice, Office of Legal Counsel attorney. Beth is a considerable Democrat, and she is someone I respect. We have had our differences, but I have to say that she deserves respect. In a September 25, 1987, letter signed by other Department of Justice lawyers she had this to say:

We all hold Mr. Olson in a very high professional and personal regard because we believe he made his decisions with integrity after long and hard reflection. We cannot recall a single instance in which Mr. Olson compromised his integrity to serve the expedience of the Reagan administration.

That is high praise coming from Beth Nolan, a strong Democrat who has served both in the White House Counsel's office and at Justice in the office of Legal Counsel.

One of the most esteemed first amendment lawyers in the country, a strong Democrat, one of the men I most respect with regard to first amendment interpretations and first amendment constitutional challenges, is Floyd Abrams—again, I submit, a liberal Democrat.

On March 4, 2001, he had this to say about Ted Olson:

I have known Ted since we worked together on a Supreme Court case, Metro Media v. San Diego, 20 years ago. I have always been impressed with his talent, his personal decency, and his honor. He would serve with distinction as a Solicitor General.

This is one of the greatest lawyers in the country, a man of distinction himself who has great judgment, who is a leading trial lawyer in this country.

And that is what Floyd Abrams had to say about Ted Olson.

These are all Democrats. How about Harold Koh, former Clinton administration Assistant Secretary of State. On February 28, 2001, he had this to say:

Ted Olson is a lawyer of extremely high professional integrity. In all of my dealings with him I have seen him display high moral character and a very deep commitment to unholding the rule of law.

That is high praise from a former Clinton administration high-level employee. All of these are Democrats, leading Democrats, some partisan Democrats, but who have found Ted Olson to be a man of honor and integrity.

One of the greatest lawyers in the country is Robert Bennett, attorney for former President Clinton. Robert Bennett is known by virtually everybody in this body for having been an independent counsel himself, and having done his jobs with distinction. Nobody doubts he is one of the greatest lawyers in this country. Nobody doubts that the two Bennett brothers are personalities about as compelling as you can find.

Well, Robert Bennett happens to be a Democrat, and a leading Democrat, one of the great attorneys in this country. And here is what the attorney for former President Clinton had to say on May 15, 2001:

While I do not have any personal knowledge as to what role if any Mr. Olson played in the Arkansas Project or the full extent of his relationship with the American Spectator, what I do know is that Ted Olson is a truth teller and you can rely on his representations regarding these matters. He is a man of great personal integrity and credibility and should be confirmed.

I am submitting to this body that people of good will, that people who want good government, people who want the best of the best in these positions at the Justice Department, ought to vote for Ted Olson regardless of their political affiliation, regardless of the fact that Ted Olson handled Bush v. Gore and won both cases before the Supreme Court—something that some of my colleagues bitterly resent. They should vote for him regardless of the fact that, yes, he has been a strong Republican—some think too partisan of a Republican. But he has a reputation of being a person who calls them as he sees them, an honest man of integrity. This is backed up by these wonderful Democratic leaders at the legal bar, Laurence Tribe, Walter Dellinger, Beth Nolan, Floyd Abrams, Harold Koh, Robert Bennett, just to mention six terrifically strong Democrats. If anybody wants to know, they ought to listen to people in the other party who have every reason to be partisan on nominations in some ways, but who are not allowing partisanship to enter into hurting the career or hurting the opportunity of Ted Olson to serve as Solicitor General.

I personally know Ted Olson. I have known him for many years. I have seen him courageously take on client after client across the ideological spectrum and do a great job in each case for his clients. This is an exceptional lawyer. He is one of the exceptional people in our country. He has the capacity and the ability to be a great, and I repeat great, Solicitor General of the United States. He is respected by the Supreme Court before whom he has appeared at least 15 times.

And for those who might not remember, he was the attorney for George W. Bush in Bush v. Gore, and made two arguments before the Supreme Court, both of which he handled with dexterity, with skill, with decency, and with intelligence.

I have to say he deserves this job, he deserves not having people play politics with this position. In my opinion, he will make a great Solicitor General of the United States. Let me just dispel some of the allegations surrounding this nomination and explain why I believe further delay is unwarranted.

First, there have been allegations that Mr. Olson has misled the committee concerning his involvement in something called the Arkansas Project and his representation of David Hale. Let me say that I listened to my colleagues on the committee when the Washington Post article first appeared, and delayed a vote, against my better judgment actually, until we weighed the allegations because it was fair to do so.

My colleagues wanted that, they deserved that, and we delayed it so we could weigh those allegations. Then I took several days and extensively reviewed the testimony during the hearings, his answers to written questions, and his subsequent letter. I am convinced that those responses showed no inconsistencies or evidence that Mr. Olson misled or was less than truthful to the committee anyway. Rather, they show him to be forthright and honorable.

Although I have not seen any discrepancies or inconsistencies in Mr. Olson's testimony and answers, I have tried to respect the concerns of other members of this committee and joined the distinguished ranking Democratic member in looking further into this matter and asking further clarifying questions from the Office of the Independent Counsel. We look into some insinuations against Mr. Olson concerning his involvement with the Arkansas Project and his legal representation of David Hale.

In order to verify Mr. Olson's statements, the committee has had access to a great volume of materials, including all relevant portions of the Shaheen Report that could be provided by law, letters from key individuals involved with the Arkansas Project, and just yesterday, at Senator LEAHY's request, a copy of David Hale's testimony at another trial, and more information from the Office of Independent Counsel. These together simply confirm Mr. Olson's statements and show that there is no need for additional investigations.

Now, I would like to relate some of my findings in investigating the record and alleged inconsistencies. With regard to the Arkansas Project, Mr. Olson repeatedly stated that he learned about the project while he was a member of the board of directors and that he did not know about it prior to his service on that board. He also consistently stated that he learned of the project in 1997. In an early response he stated that he became aware of it in "1998, I believe." He later clarified that it was in 1997 and has consistently maintained that he learned of the project in 1997. Each of the quotations used by Senator LEAHY in his so-called "summary of discrepancies" confirms this fact and does not provide, despite the title of the document, any real discrepancies in Mr. Olson's testimony.

Key individuals intimately involved with the Arkansas Project have written letters to the committee confirming Mr. Olson's account of events. These individuals include James Ring Adams, Steven Boynton, Douglas Cox, Terry Eastland, David Henderson, Michael Horowitz, Wladyslaw Pleszczynski, and R. Emmett Tyrell.

From their different positions, each person corroborates the fact that Mr. Olson was not involved with the origination or management of the Arkansas Project. R. Emmett Tyrell, the editor-in-chief of the magazine, stated unequivocally that Mr. Olson's statements with regard to his involvement with the project are "accurate and thus truthful."

Terry Eastland, former publisher of the American Spectator, conducted a review of the project and stated he "found no evidence that Mr. Olson was involved in the project's creation or its conduct." Other letters make similar statements about Mr. Olson's lack of involvement before 1997. All of them are consistent with his testimony, and they are not rebutted by any other credible evidence.

Mr. President, let me summarize for my colleagues. We have Mr. Olson's sworn testimony along with the statements of key players in the project and numerous letters by Democrats and Republicans who praise Mr. Olson's integrity and honesty, against the lukewarm allegations of one former staffer who has recently backed away from his remarks. Even if Mr. Brock's factual allegations were true, they do not contradict Mr. Olson's testimony.

Now the second possible allegation against Mr. Olson is that, contrary to his testimony, he might have received payment for his representation of David Hale. Mr. Olson has repeatedly answered questions about this representation. He testified that he received no money for this representation, although he had expected to be paid.

Then in a letter of May 9, 2001, in response to further questions, he again stated that he received no payments for his representation of David Hale. He wrote, "Neither I nor my firm has been compensated by any other person or entity for those services—although I am not aware of any legal prohibition against another person or entity making such a payment." He have this report and I urge my colleagues to read it. I have extra copies of this and other recent material with me, if any colleague cares to further review it.

Now, I have seen no, let me repeat, no evidence suggesting this testimony is not accurate. Mr. Olson responded to questions about these issues at his hearing and in three sets of written questions—each time his answers have been clear and consistent.

But you don't just have to take Mr. Olson's word for it. His answers are clearly supported by the conclusions reached by Mr. Shaheen and reviewed independently by two respected retired federal judges. Under a process jointly approved by the Independent Counsel and Attorney General Janet Reno, Mr. Shaheen was appointed to review the allegations concerning alleged payments to David Hale.

In order to get all the facts, Mr. Shaheen was given authority to utilize a grand jury to compel production of evidence and testimony. In addition, another important element of this independent review process was that the results of the investigation were to receive a final review—not by the Independent Counsel or Attorney General Reno—but by two former federal judges Arlin Adams and Charles Renfrew. At the conclusion of their review, they issued a statement on July 27, 1999, in which they concurred with the conclusions of the Shaheen Report that "many of the allegations, suggestions and insinuations regarding the tendering and receipt of things of value were shown to be unsubstantiated or, in some cases, untrue."

And if the Shaheen Report was not sufficient, Senator LEAHY requested a transcript of David Hale's testimony at the trial of Jim Guy Tucker and Jim and Susan McDougal, apparently because of accounts of that testimony in Joe Conason and Gene Lyons' book, "The Hunting of the President." The Office of the Independent Counsel has graciously made David Hale's trial transcript available to the committee in response to Senator LEAHY's May 14, 2001 letter. A review of the transcript clearly shows further that Mr. Olson's testimony was accurate.

In the transcript, David Hale testified that Ted Olson was retained to represent him before a congressional committee. When asked, "Who pays Mr. Olson to represent you?" Mr. Hale replied, "I do." Mr. Hale did not say that he or anyone on his behalf actually paid Mr. Olson.

The transcript of the trial is fully consistent with Mr. Olson's testimony regarding the Hale representation—namely that he never received payment for the representation, that Mr. Hale intended to pay for these services, and that no one else was responsible for the payments. Mr. Hale also testified that he first contacted Mr. Olson in 1993 in connection with a possible congressional subpoena, and that Olson did represent him in 1995–1996. Mr. Olson wrote in his letter (May 9, 2001) that he was "ultimately engaged by Mr. Hale and undertook that representation sometime in late 1995 or early 1996."

Thus, with regard to David Hale, there is no evidence from any source that Mr. Olson received payment for this representation. Mr. Olson's testimony, David Hale's testimony, the Independent Counsel report, and review of the matter by two former federal judges all confirm that Mr. Olson received no payment for his brief representation of David Hale. I should also note that we send further questions on this matter to the Office of the Independent Counsel, whose responses have been completely consistent with Mr. Olson's testimony.

Again, let me say that I appreciated and respected the need for members of this committee to satisfy themselves about the integrity of executive branch nominees. That is why I had delayed an initial committee vote. The committee had ample opportunity to verify the statements of Mr. Olson—no discrepancies have appeared, nor is there any credible evidence to refute any part of his testimony.

We have the statements of individuals involved with the Arkansas project. Staff members of the committee have been able to view the Shaheen report and the trial testimony of David Hale. I know that internal information has been requested from the American Spectator magazine, but I am concerned that such demands may tread on precious first amendment prerogatives of the press that we should all be careful to protect, even though it frustrates all of us from time to time. And I know that Democratic staff have interviewed Mr. Brock.

I believe that the extensive and decisive record before us shows that Mr. Olson has been truthful and forthright on all counts.

The facts and conclusions I have just discussed—that there are no discrepancies between Ted Olson's statements and Senator LEAHY's allegations—beg the question: What is all this fuss really about?

Perhaps it is because some may believe that Mr. Olson is too partisan to serve as the Solicitor General. Nothing could be further from the truth. Ted Olson's career has been as broad as it has been deep. Mr. Olson has advocated for a wide variety of organizations and has associated with people of many different political ideologies.

While it is true that Mr. Olson has performed legal work for the conservative American Spectator, to focus myopically on that is to ignore Mr. Olson's distinguished work for many other media organizations including the New York Times, the Washington Post, Times-Mirror, the Los Angeles Times, Dow Jones, LA magazine, NBC, ABC, CNN, Fox, Time-Warner, Newsday, Metromedia, the Wall Street Journal, and Newsweek. What does this list show about Ted Olson? Is this the kind of clientele that would seek after a single-issue zealot? No way. This list demonstrates clearly that smart people with a variety of views on public matters turn to—and trust—Ted Olson.

Similarly, it is possible to pay too much attention to one person's apparent dissonant opinion when there is a chorus of other harmonized voices.

Now, I have to concede that Ted Olson's supporters include a lot of well-known partisans.

For example, President Clinton's lawyer, Bob Bennett, said that "Ted Olson is a truth-teller" and he is "confident that [Ted Olson] will obey and enforce the law with skill, integrity and impartiality." A similar sentiment was expressed by President Clinton's White House Counsel, Beth Nolan. And Vice President Al Gore's lawyer, Laurence Tribe, has publically announced his support for Ted Olson's confirmation as Solicitor General. Floyd Abrams, who has known Ted Olson for 20 years, and who is no right-wing conspirator, said he has "always been impressed with [Ted Olson's] talent, his personal decency and his honor." President Clinton's Assistant Secretary of State for Democracy, Human Rights and Labor, Harold Koh, called Ted Olson "a lawyer of extremely high professional integrity." And William Webster said Ted Olson is "honest and trustworthy and he has my full trust."

These names demonstrate that Ted Olson's experience, character and associations have a tremendous breadth and depth. It is time for this body to do the right thing and favorably vote to confirm Mr. Olson as the Solicitor General.

Mr. President, I would also like to make a few more brief comments on Mr. Olson's nomination to set the record straight.

First, there has been repeated insinuation and accusation that Mr. Olson has misled the committee concerning his involvement with the so-called Arkansas Project and his representation of David Hale.

I, responding to concerns by some Democrats, listened and delayed the vote May 10 until the committee reviewed the record and weighed the allegations.

Since the Washington Post story broke, I and my staff have extensively reviewed Mr. Olson's testimony during his hearing, his answers to written questions, and his subsequent letters. I am convinced that these responses show no inconsistencies or evidence that Mr. Olson misled or was less than truthful to the committee in any way. Rather they show him to be forthright and honest.

In order to verify Mr. Olson's statements, the committee has had access to a great volume of materials, including all relevant portions of the Shaheen Report that could be provided by law, letters from key individuals involved with the Arkansas Project, and at Senator LEAHY's request, a copy of David Hale's testimony at another trial.

We have had access to more material from the Office of the Independent Counsel, a number of questions that Senator LEAHY and I jointly asked that office and have received the responses.

All of this material, and the overwhelming evidence already on the record, continue to support Mr. Olson's veracity and complete candor before the committee. There are none, nor has there been, any specific evidence supporting allegations against Mr. Olson.

Key individuals intimately involved with the Arkansas Project have written letters to the committee confirming Mr. Olson's account of events. A host of respected and distinguished lawyers, judges, private and public figures who have worked with Ted Olson have written in and/or called the committee with their support for Mr. Olson's nomination and have vouched for his integrity and candor. These include the two respected attorneys who argued against Mr. Olson in each of the two Supreme Court arguments in Bush v. Gore.

From their different positions, each person corroborates the fact that Mr. Olson as not involved with the origination or management of the Arkansas Project. R. Emmett Tyrell, the editor-in-chief of the magazine, stated unequivocally that Mr. Olson's statements with regard to his involvement with the project are "accurate and thus truthful." Terry Eastland, former publisher of the American Spectator, conducted a review of the project and stated he "found no evidence that Mr. Olson was involved in the project's creation or its conduct."

The only evidence that appears to have any possible conflict with Mr. Olson's sworn testimony and the written communications of the key players in the Arkansas Project comes from David Brock, a former writer for the American Spectator, who in last Wednesday's New York Times, appeared to tone down his original account, saying, "It was my understanding that all of the pieces dating back to 1994 that dealt with investigating scandals pertaining to the Clintons, particularly those that related to his time in Arkansas, were all under the Arkansas Project." He did not say that he was sure, or that Mr. Olson knew about the project. Indeed, on a television program last Thursday evening, Mr. Brock said he had no specific recollection about speaking specifically about the Arkansas Project in the presence of Mr. Olson.

Moreover, Mr. Brock apparently suggested to one paper that James Ring Adams would have a similar view. But Mr. Adams, one of the lead writers for the project, wrote the committee that "Mr. Olson had absolutely no role in guiding my development of stories for the magazine or in managing my work."

So, we have Mr. Olson's sworn testimony along with the statements of key players in the project and numerous letters by Democrats and Republicans who praise Mr. Olson's integrity and honesty, against the luke-warm allegations of one former staffer who has recently backed away from his remarks. Even if Mr. Brock's factual allegations were true, they do not contradict Mr. Olson's testimony.

The other allegation against Mr. Olson is that, contrary to his testimony, he might have received payment for his representation of David Hale. He testified that he received no money for this representation, although he had expected to be paid.

There is no evidence suggesting this testimony is not accurate. Mr. Olson responded to questions about these issues at his hearing and in three sets of written questions—each time his answers have been clear and consistent.

His answers are clearly supported by the conclusions reached by Mr. Shaheen and reviewed independently by two respected retired federal judges. Under a process jointly approved by the Independent Counsel and Attorney General Janet Reno, Mr. Shaheen was appointed to review the allegations concerning alleged payments to David Hale. At the conclusion of their review, they issued a statement noting "many of the allegations, suggestions and insinuations regarding the tendering and receipt of things of value were shown to be unsubstantiated or, in some cases, untrue." I released the redacted portion of this Shaheen report which relates to Mr. Olson to the public. Read the report and its conclusions—and the Independent Counsel's responses to the numerous questions we have sent him regarding the report—it speaks for itself. This is not even a case revolving on the definition of what "is" is. There simply is no "there" there.

As I have noted before, we are at a period where we need to rebut the public's beliefs that we only engage in politics and don't care about the merits of nominee qualifications. We need to gain the public's trust in our government back. I am deeply concerned that what has been happening here might appear to be an effort to paint Mr. Olson's occasional political involvement as the entirety of his career and character, and as reported in the press, possibly as retribution for the man who argued and won the Supreme Court case in Bush v. Gore.

Now, I don't think that that is true. I know my colleagues and respect their views. But, I hope that we can begin debating the merits of this nomination and take all of the support and testimony on this man's obvious and overwhelming qualifications and his high integrity into account as we determine our votes for his confirmation.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to judge the record. Judge the man for his qualifications and integrity. And I urge my colleagues to listen to Laurence Tribe, to David Boies, to read the Shaheen report and responses from the Office of the Independent Counsel, to listen to Robert Bennett—President Clinton's lawyer, to everyone who has worked with and known Ted Olson. I urge you to vote to confirm our next Solicitor General.

Mr. President, let me say a few words about Mr. Olson's qualifications.

Ted Olson is one of the most qualified people ever nominated to be Solicitor General. He has had an impressive 35-year career as a lawyer—including four years as the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Justice Department's Office of Legal Policy under Ronald Reagan.

The job of the Solicitor General is to make litigation policy decisions. The Solicitor General represents the United States in all cases before the United States Supreme Court, and it is up to the Solicitor General to approve all appeals taken by the United States from adverse decisions in the lower federal courts. It is important to have a skillful and competent advocate in that position.

Ted Olson has argued 15 cases in the U.S. Supreme Court. For most lawyers, a single Supreme Court argument would be considered the zenith of their career.

Ted Olson has a reputation for considering all viewpoints before making decisions. Walter Dellinger, who served as acting Solicitor General under President Clinton, told the Washington Post that, "If Ted runs the SG's office the way he ran OLC, he will give deference to views other than his own in making his final decision."

Ted Olson's Supreme Court arguments concerned issues of great importance to our country, including limits on excessive jury verdicts, the effect of statutes of limitations, caps on punitive damages, the meaning of the Federal False Claims Act, racial and gender classifications, and whether telecommunications companies must provide surveillance capabilities to law enforcement agencies.

In addition to his role representing clients, Ted Olson has also worked to reform our civil justice system by writing and speaking on various topics, and he helped advise the government of Ukraine on drafting a new Constitution in the mid-1990's.

Ted Olson also has superb academic qualifications. He graduated from the Boalt Hall School of Law at the University of California at Berkeley, where he earned a spot in the prestigious Order of the Coif and was a member of the law review.

I have no doubt that Ted Olson will prove to be one of the best Solicitor Generals our country has ever had. Given the extraordinary quality of the people who have held that post, this is no small compliment.

With that, I yield the floor and suggest the absence of quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The senior assistant bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FITZGERALD). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Vermont.

Mr. LEAHY. I thank the Chair. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Utah, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

If I can have the chairman's attention just for a moment, I assume we are not looking for specific times and speakers on this matter but will go back and forth in the usual fashion as people arrive. Is that agreeable?

Mr. HATCH. That is agreeable. It is my understanding we have 4 hours equally divided. Mr. President, how much time have I used?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has used 29 minutes.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, for anybody who wants to speak, following the normal unofficial procedure, as people are available, we can go back and forth, side to side.

I note that I have no objection to proceeding to the motion to discharge the nomination of Ted Olson to be Solicitor General. I mention this because I want Senators to understand. We had a divided vote in the committee, and with a divided vote in the committee, because of the procedures of the Senate, I am sure we could have either bottled it up for some time in committee or for some time here. I do not want to do that. I think there should be a vote one way or the other. We have had too many examples in the past few years of nominations being bottled up that way.

On this one, I have concerns about Mr. Olson, but I am agreeable to having a vote up or down on his nomination. In fact, I say to my friend, the distinguished chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, that we also have before us the nominations of Mr. Dinh to be head of the Office of Policy Development of the Justice Department and Mr. Chertoff to be head of the Justice Department's Criminal Division. I am perfectly agreeable to roll-call votes on them, too, and will, to notify Senators, vote for them as I did in committee. Of course, that is something that has to be scheduled.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEAHY. Yes.

Mr. HATCH. I, for one, am grateful because they are good people. I missed what the Senator said. He wants to have a vote?

Mr. LEAHY. I want to have a vote on all three of these. I realize that is entirely up to the body. I am perfectly willing to have votes on all three of them. I point out, with respect to Mr. Dinh and Mr. Chertoff, I voted for them in committee, even though, as everybody knows, they are very conservative Republicans and were heavily involved in a congressional investigation of the former President and of matters in Arkansas.

Mr. HATCH. If the Senator will yield, I do not mean to keep interrupting. I want to express my gratitude that he is willing to go ahead with this and the Senate can vote on these nominees because I want to get that Justice Department—and I know the distinguished Senator from Vermont does also—up and running in the fullest sense we can. That is my only interest in this, other than I do like all three of these nominees. I thank my colleague. Forgive me for interrupting.

Mr. LEAHY. I appreciate the compliment.

Mr. Dinh and Mr. Chertoff were heavily involved in what I thought was a misguided investigation, not by them but by Members of Congress who conducted it against former President Clinton and others in Arkansas. However, I believe they followed the directions of Members of Congress, many of whom are no longer here, for a number of reasons. I will vote for them and urge their confirmation when the time comes.

I mention this because there seems to be some in the public, some among what I call the more conservative editorialists, who think there is going to be some kind of payback on the Democrats' part for the number of nominees who were held up during the Clinton administration by the Republican majority. I think it makes far more sense to look at nominations one by one on the merits.

There is no question if the roles were reversed, if somebody of Mr. Dinh's and Mr. Chertoff's background had been appointed by the last administration following their investigations of Republican Presidents and my understanding and what I have seen in the last few years, they would have been held up. I do not believe in doing that.

I told Attorney General Ashcroft—in fact, I told him earlier today—we intend to move these forward. We are moving forward most of the nominations in the Department of Justice a lot faster than they were 4 years ago in the Clinton administration by the same Senate but under different control.

I hope this may be an indication that things will move forward on their merits and not on partisanship. I urge all Senators who wish to debate to come to the floor without delay and participate.

After the motion to discharge and proceed to the nomination, I expect the Senate will proceed to vote promptly on the Olson nomination. I know Senator LOTT and Senator DASCHLE have been working toward that goal. I agree with them on it.

I will, however, express, as every Senator has a right to express his or her feelings towards or against each of these three nomination nominees, why I will vote against Ted Olson.

The Solicitor General fills a unique position in our Government. The Solicitor General is not merely another legal advocate whose mission is to advance the narrow interests of a client or merely another advocate of the President's policies. The President has people appointed on his staff or in his Cabinet to advance his policies. That is absolutely right. That is the way it should be. Whoever is President should have somebody who can advance his positions no matter whether they are partisan or not, and there are positions provided—in fact, hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of positions are provided to the President to do that.

The Solicitor General is different. The Solicitor General is not there to advance the partisan position of anybody, including somebody who is President. The Solicitor General is there to advance the interests of the United States of America, of all of us—Republican, Democrat, or Independent.

The Solicitor General must use his or her legal skills and judgments to higher purposes on behalf of the laws and the rights of all the people of the United States.

The Solicitor General does not advance a Republican or Democratic or Independent position. The Solicitor General advances the positions of the United States of America. In fact, at his hearing, Mr. Olson acknowledged—and I will use his words:

The Solicitor General holds a unique position in our government in that he has important responsibilities to all three branches of our government. . . . And he is considered an officer of the Supreme Court in that he regularly and with scrupulous honesty must present to the Court arguments that are carefully considered and mindful of the Court's role, duty, and limited resources. As the most consistent advocate before the Supreme Court, the Solicitor General and the lawyers in that office have a special obligation to inform the Court honestly and openly. The Solicitor General must be an advocate, but he must take special care that the positions he advances before the Court are fairly presented. As Professor Drew Days said to this committee during his confirmation hearing 8 years ago, the Solicitor General has a duty towards the Supreme Court of "Absolute candor and fair dealing."

Those words of Ted Olson's are words that I totally agree with. He has stated the position of the Solicitor General. He has stated it accurately. We must look at his record to see, having talked the talk, whether he walked the walk.

The Senate must carefully review nominations to the position of Solicitor General to ensure the highest levels of independence and integrity, as well as legal skills. Indeed, the Solicitor General is the only government official who must be, according to the statute, "learned in the law." We appoint a lot of people, we confirm a lot of people, but nothing in the law says they have to be "learned in the law," but for the Solicitor General it says that. The Solicitor General must argue with intellectual honesty before the Supreme Court and represent the interests of the Government and the American people for the long term, and not just with an eye to short-term political gain.

The Senate must determine whether a nominee to the position of Solicitor General understands and is suited to this extraordinary role.

It is with the importance of this position in mind that I approached the nomination of Ted Olson to serve as Solicitor General of the United States. From my initial meeting with him in advance of the April 5, 2001, hearing and thereafter, I have been assessing this nomination against the responsibilities of that important office.

At the outset, I raised with Mr. Olson my concern that his sharp partisanship over the last several years might not be something that he could leave behind. After review of his testimony both orally and in answers to written questions, I have become doubly concerned that Mr. Olson has not shown a willingness or ability to be sufficiently candid and forthcoming with the Senate so that I would have confidence in his abilities to carry out the responsibilities of the Solicitor General and be the voice of the United States before the United States Supreme Court. In addition, I am concerned about other matters in his background.

I will lay out in a much more lengthy statement for the RECORD, my concerns, but let me talk more briefly now about my concerns about Mr. Olson's candor before the committee about his involvement with the American Spectator and the Arkansas Project. His initial responses to my questions at his hearing prompted concern that the committee might not have heard a candid and complete accounting from Mr. Olson.

Rather than respond directly and say all that he did do in connection with those matters, Mr. Olson chose to respond by misdirection and say what he did not do. Frankly, in this case, and under the questions he was asked, there is a world of difference between what he did not do and what he did do. He initially described his role as extremely limited as a member of the board of directors of the American Spectator Educational Foundation and implied that he was involved only after the fact, when that board conducted a financial audit and terminated the Arkansas Project activities in 1998.

Mr. Olson has modified his answers over time, his recollection has changed, and he has conceded additional knowledge and involvement. His initial minimizing of his role appears not to be consistent with the whole story. Because his responses over time left significant questions and because of press accounts that contradicted the minimized role to which he initially admitted, I wanted to work with Senator HATCH before the Judiciary Committee voted on this nomination to have the committee perform the bipartisan factual inquiry needed to set forth the facts and resolve all questions and concerns about Mr. Olson's answers.

I wanted to have us do the bipartisan fact finding that we always do when such issues come up.

Indeed, Senator HATCH postponed one committee vote on Mr. Olson's nomination on May 10 and admitted that "some legitimate questions" have arisen and that "legitimate issues" were involved. He said that after an article in the Washington Post indicated that Mr. Olson's role at American Spectator and the activities of the Arkansas Project were more than just as a member of the board of directors in 1998 to which a financial audit was provided.

My friend from Utah did not agree to that limited inquiry before the committee voted on Mr. Olson's nomination, but with the constructive assistance of the leaders and their staff, we were able to make progress over the last week.

Let me describe just a few of the discrepancies in Mr. Olson's evolving statements to this committee. These are discrepancies that give me pause.

First, Mr. Olson has minimized his knowledge of the Arkansas Project and its activities through—well, word games and definitional ploys. At the hearing, I asked him the direct question: "Were you involved in the so-called Arkansas Project at any time?" Mr. Olson responded by saying what he did not do, and with reference to his membership on the board of directors:

As a member of the board of directors of the American Spectator, I became aware of that. It has been alleged that I was somehow involved in that so-called project. I was not involved in the project in its origin or its management. . . . I was on the board of the American Spectator later on when the allegations about the project were simply that it did exist.

A carefully crafted answer, like somebody spoiling or somebody maneuvering a kayak through the rocks in a whitewater rapids.

Over the past several weeks and several rounds of questions, Mr. Olson has expanded his initial response to admit that he and his firm provided legal services in connection with the matter, that he had discussions in social settings with those working on Arkansas Project matters, and that he himself authored articles for the magazine paid for out of Scaife's special Arkansas Project fund.

Mr. Olson and his supporters then began to engage in a word game over what the meaning of "Arkansas Project" is. His law partner Douglas Cox told the Post that Olson testified that he, "did not know there was this special fund set up by Scaife to finance this Arkansas fact work."

That might have explained Mr. Olson's testimony if he had said that at the time he was writing the articles and giving legal advice and talking about these matters with the staff, he had been unaware that those conversations were in connection with what came to be known as the Arkansas Project. In other words, writing and giving legal advice and talking about it, he didn't know what it was for. I think he is far too good a lawyer for that. But that is not what Mr. Olson testified. In fact, he admitted that he became aware of the Arkansas Project at least by 1998, and then changed that testimony to sometime in 1997.

He said he was a member of the board that received an audit of the Scaife funds. So by 2001, his knowledge of the Arkansas Project and the funding by Scaife was undeniable.

Second, evidence uncovered during the committee's limited bipartisan inquiry following the committee vote, raises serious question about whether Mr. Olson accurately denied any role in the "origin" of the Arkansas Project by failing to respond correctly to direct questions about a meeting in his law office held in late December, 1993 when this project was getting organized. Not in 2001 but 1993.

Third, Mr. Olson has apparently downplayed his involvement in the development and direction of Arkansas Project stories, perhaps to avoid any inconsistency with his initial representation to the committee that he was not involved in the management of this project.

According to a published report in the Washington Post on May 20, 2001, the report to which Senator HATCH referred when he indicated that "legitimate questions" had been raised, David Brock told Post reporters that "Olson attended a number of dinner meetings at the home of R. Emmett Tyrrell, Jr., president and chairman of the Spectator, which were explicitly brainstorming sessions about the Arkansas Project."

While Mr. Olson refused to respond to this allegation, his law partner, Douglas Cox, who worked on the Spectator account, conceded that Olson attended such dinners, but that "did not mean that he was aware of the scope of the Arkansas Project and the Scaife funding."

David Brock has also indicated that Mr. Olson was "directly involved in the Arkansas Project, participating in discussions about possible stories and advising the magazine whether to publish one of its most controversial stories, about the death of Clinton White House deputy counsel Vincent Foster." According to the account in the Post, Mr. Olson told Mr. Brock that, "while he didn't place any stock in the piece, it was worth publishing because the role of the Spectator was to write Clinton scandal stories in hopes of 'shaking scandals loose.'"

That is an interesting position for a lawyer to take: Print a story you know not to be true, hoping that by printing untruths you will somehow bring forward truths. That is not what I was taught in law school, certainly not in our legal ethics courses.

In his response to Senator HATCH, Mr. Olson did not deny Mr. Brock's account head on.

Instead, he wrote that he told Mr. Brock that the article did not appear to be libelous or to raise any legal issues that would preclude its publication, and that he was not going to tell the editor-in-chief what should appear in the magazine.

The Washington Post also reported that others said that project story ideas, legal issues involving the stories, and other directly related matters were discussed with Mr. Olson by staff members and at dinner parties of Spectator staff and board members. The reaction from Mr. Olson's supporters was swift. On May 15, 2001, Chairman HATCH shared with the committee a letter he obtained from the two men quoted denying the specific words in the Post story but not denying that they talked to the Post reporters.

In a blatant effort to undermine Mr. Brock's powerful, first hand recollection of Mr. Olson's participation in and contributions to the activities of the Arkansas Project, Mr. Tyrrell also submitted a statement that Mr. Brock was not a part of the Arkansas Project.

Mr. Brock, in reply, submitted strong contradictory evidence to the Tyrrell statement and supplied the committee with multiple Arkansas Project expense reports, expense reports, I might note, which remain unrefuted and which Mr. Brock states, "clearly show that I was reimbursed thousands of dollars by the Project for travel, office supplies, postage, and the like."

Taken as a whole, Mr. Olson was clearly involved and participating both professionally and socially in the work of the American Spectator and its Arkansas Project. There is absolutely nothing illegal about this involvement and participation, which makes me wonder, why not be forthcoming and honest about it? But it shows a larger role in these activities than Mr. Olson initially portrayed.

Mr. Olson also minimized his role in the Arkansas Project and the American Spectator by failing to give complete information about the amount of remuneration he has received for his activities on their behalf when he was first asked. He told us on April 19 that he was paid from $500 to $1,000 for his articles that appeared in the American Spectator magazine. Yet, we find out in the Washington Post on May 10 that his firm was paid over $8,000 for work that was used in just one of those articles.

In addition, the Post reported that over $14,000 was paid to Mr. Olson's law firm and attributed to the Arkansas Project.

When he was asked during his hearing about an article he had coauthored that was published under the pseudonym—I want to make sure I get this right—"Solitary, Poor, Nasty, Brutish and Short" in the magazine he did not indicate that "the magazine hired [his] firm to prepare" such materials and to perform legal research on the theoretical criminal exposure of the President and Mrs. Clinton based on press accounts of their conduct. I, for one, thought Mr. Olson had defended his writings as matters of personal first amendment political expression, an absolute right that he and all of us have. Certainly, I had no idea from his testimony at his confirmation hearing that this article was part of his and his firm's ongoing legal representation of American Spectator Educational Foundation, that it was a commissioned piece of legal writing, paid for by a grant from conservative billionaire Richard Mellon Scaife.

I am now left to wonder whether his article that was so critical of the Attorney General and the Justice Department was as he described them at his hearing the "statements of a private citizen," or another richly paid for political tract.

Again, he, like all of us, can write any kind of a political tract he wants. He, like all of us, can make statements critical of anybody he wants. He can even make outlandish charges. But let's be honest about what we have done when testifying under oath before the Judiciary Committee.

His supporters repeat the mantra that even if he was paid with Arkansas Project funds, Mr. Olson would not have known that. What they leave out is a necessary qualifier "at the time he received the payment." By the time he came to the committee and testified, in answer to direct questions, he had become privy to the internal audit of the Arkansas Project. In fact, he says he became privy to that 3 years ago in 1998. That audit and his knowledge as a board member of the extent of the Arkansas Project that it revealed rendered Mr. Olson's testimony in April, 2001, less than complete.

Having now conceded his involvement in these matters, something he did not do initially, the question arises: How extensive was that involvement as a lawyer? That is why I asked at least for production of his firm's billing records for legal services rendered to the American Spectator, but I was stonewalled on that request. Mr. Olson asserted attorney-client privilege; but he did not offer to cooperate by producing nonprivileged copies of those records.

Every lawyer in this place knows what is privileged and what is not, what falls under attorney-client privilege and what does not. And he did not even want to produce those things that clearly fall outside the attorney-client privilege. In fact, such nonprivileged records have been produced in connection with other Government inquiries. Certainly in the last 6 years, documents have been produced by the bushel to the same Judiciary Committee during other investigations.

As part of the bipartisan inquiry undertaken after the committee vote on this nomination, we became aware of this fact. The independent counsel review and report we were able to read—that was only a small part of it—indicates that requests were made to Mr. Olson and his law firm for billing records for any client that had received Scaife foundation grants between 1992 and 1998 in order to ascertain whether there had “been an indirect method to compensate (the law firm) for its unpaid representation of Hale.” That would be David Hale.

Just as here, Mr. Olson’s law firm initially invoked attorney-client privilege but realized that ultimately they had to give what were nonprivileged billing records for Mr. Olson. And they showed Mr. Olson’s representation of both David Hale and the American Spectator. But the independent counsel was unable to forward those records in response to the bipartisan, joint request for them by Senator HATCH and myself.

So Senator HATCH and I then sent a joint request to Mr. Olson’s firm requesting information about the total amount of fees paid by the American Spectator to the firm. Remember, the implication was there really was not anything there. Today, we were informed that the amount paid was not $500 to $1,000 per article the committee was first told by Mr. Olson. Instead, it was for legal services performed $94,405.

I am not a bookkeeper. I was a mid-level math student. But like most Vermonters, I can count. There is quite a bit of difference between $500 to $1,000 and $94,405.

Mr. Olson has tried to distance himself from the most controversial aspects of the Arkansas Project in its activities to publicize allegations of wrongdoing about the Clintons in Arkansas. Mr. Olson stated that he “represented the American Spectator in the performance of legal services from time to time beginning in 1994 * * * those legal services were not for the purpose of conducting or assisting in the conduct of investigations of the Clintons.”

Yet, we find out he was paid over $8,000 to prepare a chart outlining the Clintons’ criminal exposure as research for a February 1994 article Mr. Olson co-authored against the Clintons entitled, “Criminal laws Implicated by the Clinton Scandals: A partial list.”

Finally, Mr. Olson has testified he simply does not recall who contacted him to represent David Hale.

This is a man who has as sharp a mind as just about anybody I have met around here, but he does not recall who contacted him to represent David Hale, a central part of this whole inquiry.

So when I asked Mr. Olson at his April 5 hearing how he came to represent Mr. Hale he started by saying, “[t]wo of [Hale’s] then lawyers contacted me and asked . . .” A few seconds later Mr. Olson said:

[o]ne of his lawyers contacted me—I can’t recall the man’s name—and asked whether I would be available to represent Mr. Hale in connection with that subpoena here in Washington, D.C. They felt that they needed Washington counsel with some experience dealing with a congressional investigation. I did agree to do that. Mr. Hale and I met together.

Even in his May 9 letter, Mr. Olson asserts that he, “cannot recall when [he] was first contacted about the possibility of representing Mr. Hale.” He indicates that he believes, “that [he] was contacted by a person or persons whose identities [he] cannot presently recall sometime before then regarding whether I might be willing to represent Mr. Hale if he needed representation in Washington.”

The Washington Post reported that David Henderson said that he introduced Hale to Olson. Interestingly, David Henderson apparently signed a statement on May 14 indicating that in his view he broke no law while implementing the Arkansas Project. But what he does not say and what he does not deny is that he was the person who introduced David Hale to Mr. Olson.

The role that David Henderson played in introducing David Hale to Mr. Olson is apparently corroborated by several other witnesses who have spoken to the American Prospect in a story released today.

It now strikes me as strange that a man as capable as Mr. Olson with his vast abilities of recall could not remember the name of David Henderson, if Mr. Henderson was, in fact, involved in setting up that representation.

And it strikes me as doubly strange when the bipartisan inquiry conducted after the committee vote on this nomination uncovered evidence that Mr. Olson was able to recall who introduced him to David Hale just a couple of years ago when he was asked the same question.

The Hale independent counsel report indicates that in 1998 Mr. Olson could supply the name of the person who referred David Hale to him for legal representation.

It leads one to easily wonder whether Mr. Olson’s failure to recall the name, David Henderson, in the year 2001 had something to do with him not wanting to indicate the connection to such a central figure in the Arkansas project.

Some would say, what importance is there to this? Does it really matter whether Mr. Olson accurately and fully described his role in the American Spectator and the Arkansas project? This nomination is for the office of Solicitor General. It is important for two reasons, both of which go to the fitness of the nominee to serve as Solicitor General.

The principal question raised by the nomination of Mr. Olson to this particular position—remember, this is a position that is supposed to be non-political, nonpartisan, representing all Americans of whatever political allegiance they have, or whether they have none. The question is whether his partisanship over the last several years in connection with so many far-reaching anti-Clinton efforts to mark Mr. Olson as a thorough-going partisan who will not be able to check his partisan political instincts at the door to the Office of the Solicitor General.

Now, the reason I ask that is we have another nominee before us, Michael Chertoff, and we asked some of these same questions about Michael Chertoff. In that case, the questions were answered, the doubts dissipated. Instead of a 9-9 vote, Mr. Chertoff, had a roll-call vote in committee and it was unanimous; Republicans and Democrats across the political spectrum voted for him. There were Doubts, but the questions about Mr. Chertoff disappeared. But the doubts and questions about Mr. Olson have grown over time.

Had Mr. Olson been straightforward with the committee, had he conceded the extent of his involvement in anti-Clinton activities and given the kinds of assurances that Mr. Chertoff did about his upcoming responsibilities, I could very easily be supporting his confirmation.

Actually, when I first met with Mr. Olson, and even at his hearing before we had a chance to go through all of his answers and see the areas where they didn’t show consistency, I had hoped and expected to be supporting him. In fact, I remember saying to someone in my office at that time that I assumed I would be supporting him. I expected to be able to give him the benefit of the doubt.

In light of the deference I normally accord a President’s executive branch nominees, I fully expected to be voting for this nomination, just as I voted for so many by the five previous Presidents, both Republican and Democrat.

In the wake of the hearing, the series of supplemental responses we have received, and the unanswered questions now in the public record about Mr. Olson’s involvement in partisan activities like the Arkansas project, I have many doubts.

We also have a question of candor and straightforwardness. I have not had the sense from his hearing onward that Mr. Olson has been truly forthcoming with either me or with the committee. My sense is that for some reason he chose from the outset to try to minimize his role in connection with the activities of the American Spectator, that he has sought to characterize it in the most favorable possible light, that he has sought to conclude for us rather than provide us with the facts and let us conclude how to view his activities.

As I review the record and the initial nonresponsiveness, lack of recall, corrections when confronted with specifics, I am left to wonder what happened to "absolute candor and fair dealing," the touchstone that Mr. Olson himself says is necessary for a Solicitor General. In concluding my May 4, 2001, letter to Mr. Olson, I noted:

The credibility of the person appointed to be the Solicitor General is of paramount importance. When arguing in front of the Supreme Court on behalf of the United States Government, the Solicitor General is expected to come forward with both the strengths and weaknesses of the case, to inform the Court of things it might not otherwise know, and to be honest in all his or her dealings with the Court. I expect that same responsiveness and cooperation from nominees before this Committee.

My expectation had been to support him. Please understand, this is not the role of a lawyer advocate in our legal system. I have been an advocate of the court, both at the trial level and at the appellate level. I have been there both for the prosecution and for the defense. In private practice, I was there both for the plaintiffs and defendants. You fight like mad. You make as strong a case for your client as you can. That is fine.

The Solicitor General is different. The Solicitor General is sometimes referred to as the tenth justice. He is expected to tell the Court these are the strengths of my case, but let me tell you also where the weaknesses are of my case. If a matter is left out, or there might be a weakness in the case, he is duty-bound to bring it forward to the Court's knowledge because, if confirmed, Mr. Olson is not a lawyer advocate for just one client because that client is the United States of America—all 270 million of us. I want to be sure that our Nation's top lawyer will see the truth and speak the truth fully to the Supreme Court and represent all of our best interests in the matters over which the Solicitor General exercises public authority.

I have confidence that Mr. Olson is an extremely capable lawyer. Of course, I do. Do I have confidence that he can set aside partisanship to thoroughly and evenhandedly represent the United States of America before the Supreme Court? I do not have such confidence, and I cannot vote for him.

Mr. President, how much time remains for the Senator from Vermont?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are 76 minutes remaining.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, the Solicitor General fills a unique position in our Government. The Solicitor General is not merely another legal advocate whose mission is to advance the narrow interests of a client, or merely another advocate of his President's policies.

The Solicitor General is much more than that. The Solicitor General must use his or her legal skills and judgment for higher purposes on behalf of the law and the rights of all the people of the United States.

At his hearing, Mr. Olson acknowledged that:

The Solicitor General holds a unique position in our Government in that he has important responsibilities to all three branches of our Government. . . . And he is considered an officer of the Supreme Court in that he regularly and with scrupulous honesty must present to the Court arguments that are carefully considered and mindful of the Court's role, duty, and limited resources. As the most consistent advocate before the Supreme Court, the Solicitor General and the lawyers in that office have a special obligation to inform the Court honestly and openly. The Solicitor General must be an advocate, but he must take special care that the positions he advances before the Court are fairly presented. As Professor Drew Days said to this committee during his confirmation hearing 8 years ago, the Solicitor General has a duty towards the Supreme Court of "absolute candor and fair dealing."

Republicans and Democrats have carefully reviewed nominations to the position of Solicitor General to ensure the highest levels of independence and integrity, as well as legal skills. Indeed, the Solicitor General is the only government official who must be, according to the statute, "learned in the law." The Solicitor General must argue with intellectual honesty before the Supreme Court and represent the interests of the Government and the American people for the long term, and not just with an eye to short-term political gain. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a recent article by Professor Lincoln Caplan on the role of the Solicitor General.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, May 18, 2001]
THE PRESIDENT'S LAWYER, AND THE COURT'S
(By Lincoln Caplan)

NEW HAVEN.—The job of solicitor general is one of the most eminent in American law. Part advocate, the S. G. as he is called, represents the United States before the Supreme Court, where the federal government is involved in about two-thirds of all cases decided on the merits (as opposed to procedural grounds). Part judge, he chooses when the government should appeal a case it has lost in a lower court, file a friend-of-the-court brief, or defend an act of Congress. Most S.G.'s have influenced rulings in landmark cases; many have become judges; four have risen to the Supreme Court. Yet for most of this tiny office's history since it was created in 1870, the S.G. drew little public or even scholarly attention.

Today, however, the nomination of Theodore Olson to be S.G. is headline news, as is evident from the attention to the Senate Judiciary Committee's 9-9 vote on it yesterday, a split along party lines. In the past 40 years, the courts have become forums for resolving social questions, and the docket of the Supreme Court has become defined by the most divisive issues. During the past 15 years, especially, as the line between law and politics has been increasingly hard to draw, the choice of a solicitor general has become more important politically than that of any legal figure except for the attorney general or a Supreme Court justice.

The choice of Mr. Olson makes this point sensationally because his legal accomplishments are so marked by ideology. As a young Justice Department official under Ronald Reagan, he made his name as an adamant defender against Democrats in Congress who were trying to probe a Republican environmental scandal. He has litigated matters like a major anti-affirmative-action case in Texas, brought by conservative activists to overturn liberal precedents. He has served on the board of the conservative American Spectator magazine, for which he wrote biting, anonymous criticism of Bill and Hillary Clinton. He has helped lead the Federal Society, a conservative legal organization that is now a formidable force in the Bush Administration. Most significantly, he was the winning attorney in the Supreme Court case of Bush v. Gore. During Mr. Olson's Senate confirmation hearing, Richard Durbin, Democrat of Illinois, said to him, "I can't find any parallel in history of anyone who was as actively involved in politics as you and went on to become solicitor general."

For the S.G.'s office, the Olson nomination frames a debate that was sparked during the Reagan years and remains undecided.

The traditional view holds that the solicitor general has a unique role in American law and functions as "the 10th justice." Justice Lewis Powell, for example, argued that the S.G. has a "dual responsibility"—to represent the president's administration but also to help the Supreme Court develop the law in ways that serve the long-term interests of the United States. (To some experts, the S.G.'s duty to defend federal statutes amounts to a third responsibility, to Congress.) Rex Lee, the first solicitor general in the Reagan administration, was an unequivocal conservative. Yet he was forced to quit by colleagues who thought he was too restrained in his advocacy of the president's social agenda. Famously, he said that it would have been wrong for him to "press the administration's policies at every turn and announce true conservative principles through the pages of my briefs." He was, he stated, "the solicitor general, not the pamphleteer general."

A more recent view is that the S. G. should act as a partisan advocate for policies of the president, not as the legal conscience of the government. Rather than defending a position of independence within the administration, Mr. Lee's successor, Charles Fried, told the Senate that "it would be peevish and inappropriate for the solicitor general to be anything but cheerful" while supporting the views and interests of the president who appointed him.

The latter outlook is much easier to defend. The separation of powers among the three branches of government makes it simplest to regard the solicitor general as a spokesman for the executive branch: the concept of a dual responsibility (or a triple one) confounds the notion of checks and balances.

Yet for decades the former outlook prevailed, and it is supported in the only official statement about the S. G.'s role, issued in 1977 by the Justice Department. The Supreme Court has bestowed on the solicitor general a special status—seeking the S. G.'s advice in many cases where the government isn't even a party. And the S. G. has reciprocated by fulfilling a special role in court.

If a private lawyer wins a case he thinks he should have lost, he accepts his victory in judicious silence. But when the solicitor general prevails on grounds that he considers unjust (for example, when evidence supporting a criminal verdict is slight), he may "confess error" and recommend that the Supreme Court overturn the decision. To Archibald Cox, one of the country's admired S. G.'s, surrendering victory in some cases helps justify the reliance that the Supreme Court places on the solicitor general: this practice demonstrates that the solicitor general's approach to arguing the government position is likely to be developed with the nation's long-term interests in mind.

Both views of the role require candor in the S. G. That's why last week the Senate Judiciary Committee postponed its vote on Mr. Olson after reports surfaced that he had given misleading testimony, during his confirmation hearing, about his role in a project run by The American Spectator to find damaging information about the activities of the Clintons in Arkansas. The question of misleading testimony is reminiscent of a rebuke to Mr. Olson by an independent counsel who investigated whether he had lied to Congress in testimony during his days as a Reagan defender. While "literally true," the counsel stated, that testimony was "potentially misleading."

Whether he is approved as solicitor general by the full Senate or the Bush administration must choose someone else for the post, a deeper question endures: Is it now acceptable to define the job as that of an outright partisan? Or should the S. G. remain an advocate for the nation's long-term interests whose duty to the rule of law goes beyond allegiance to the political views of the administration?

Mr. LEAHY. The Senate must determine whether a nominee to the position of Solicitor General understands and is suited to this extraordinary role. From Benjamin Bristow in 1870, to William Howard Taft and Charles Evans Hughes, Jr., from Robert Jackson to Archibald Cox, Thurgood Marshall and Erwin Griswold, we have had extraordinary people serve this country as our Solicitors General. It is with the importance of this position in mind that I approached the nomination of Ted Olson to serve as Solicitor General of the United States. From my initial meeting with him in advance of the April 5, 2001, hearing and thereafter, I have been assessing this nomination against the responsibilities of that important office.

Initial Concerns. At the outset, I raised with Mr. Olson my concern that his sharp partisanship over the last several years might not be something that he could leave behind. After review of his testimony both orally and in answers to written questions, I have become doubly concerned that Mr. Olson has not shown a willingness or ability to be sufficiently candid and forthcoming with the Senate so that I would have confidence in his abilities to carry out the responsibilities of the Solicitor General and be the voice of the United States before the United States Supreme Court. In addition, I am concerned about other matters in his background.

I will detail below the source of my concerns about Mr. Olson's candor before the Committee about his involvement with the American Spectator and the "Arkansas Project." His initial responses to my questions at his hearing prompted concern that the Committee might not have heard a candid and complete accounting from Mr. Olson. Rather than respond directly and say all that he did do in connection with those matters, Mr. Olson chose to respond by misdirection and say what he did not do. He initially described his role as extremely limited as a member of the Board of Directors of the American Spectator Educational Foundation and implied that he was involved only after the fact, when that Board conducted a financial audit and terminated the "Arkansas Project" activities in 1998.

Need for Committee Inquiry. Mr. Olson has modified his answers over time, his recollection has changed, and he has conceded additional knowledge and involvement. His initial minimizing of his role appears not to be consistent with the whole story. Because his responses over time left significant questions and because of press accounts that contradicted the minimized role to which he initially admitted, I wanted to work with Senator HATCH before the Judiciary Committee voted on this nomination to have the Committee perform the bipartisan factual inquiry needed to set forth the facts and resolve all questions and concerns about Mr. Olson's answers.

Indeed, Senator HATCH postponed one Committee vote on Mr. Olson's nomination on May 10 and admitted that "some legitimate questions" have arisen and that "legitimate issues" were involved. He said that after a May 10 article in the Washington Post indicated that Mr. Olson's role at American Spectator and the activities of the "Arkansas Project" were more than just as a member of the Board of Directors in 1998 to which a financial audit was provided.

When I did not hear from Senator HATCH about how he wished to proceed to resolve those legitimate questions, I sent him a letter on May 12 proposing a course of action to avoid any undue delay. After I sent my proposal, Senator HATCH and I talked about it. He said he would be getting back to me and I held out hope that we would be able to proceed in a fair and bipartisan way to get to the facts and let all Members of the Committee make their own assessment before they voted upon the nomination.

Instead, Senator HATCH was apparently just waiting for a letter from Mr. Olson, which arrived accompanied by short, solicited statements from a few selected supporters so that he could unilaterally declare the matter closed. None of these statements could serve as a substitute for the Committee doing its job, and, instead of playing catch-up to the press, exercising the due diligence that the American people expect from the Judiciary Committee in our review of a nominee for a position sometimes called the "Tenth Supreme Court Justice." In essence, the question I wished to examine was whether Mr. Olson fully informed the Committee in response to direct questions about his role in the American Spectator and the "Arkansas Project." This was never a question of whether there was illegal conduct.

Committee Vote. Rather than proceed in a bipartisan way to establish the factual record needed to evaluate Mr. Olson's characterization of his activities, Senator HATCH rejected even an inquiry of limited duration that would have involved jointly interviewing seven individuals, who had already been quoted or referred to by the press, with contemporaneous knowledge from the time in question, and gathering relevant background documents, which had also been referred to in the press. He pressed forward with a vote in Committee on this nomination that resulted in a 9-9 tie vote.

While usually a nomination on such a vote would not be reported to the Senate, circumstances have changed that prompt me to give my consent for Mr. Olson's nomination to be considered. With the constructive assistance of both Leaders and their staffs, we were able over the past week to conduct a limited, bipartisan inquiry on the matters of concern raised by Mr. Olson's responses to the Committee.

Limited Bipartisan Inquiry: Following the 9-9 vote on this nomination in the Judiciary Committee on May 17, 2001, Senator HATCH and I released a joint statement the next day indicating that we were discussing how to move forward on the nomination and to address specific concerns that Members might have prior to the confirmation vote. As part of this inquiry, Committee staff reviewed, on a bipartisan basis, a heavily-redacted version of the report of the Office of Special Review (OSR), prepared by Michael Shaheen and May 21, 2001 responses by Independent Counsel Robert W. Ray, including to questions posed jointly by Senators HATCH and me. One of these letters is in response to a query from Senator HATCH sent unilaterally and without notice to me. On May 22, Senator HATCH and I jointly released for review by all the members of the Senate the two May 21 letters received from Mr. Ray and the redacted OSR report—with additional redactions to remove the names of specific individuals other than the nominee.

In addition, Senator HATCH released a May 22 letter to colleagues that included 71-pages of American Spectator-related records, which were anonymously delivered to my Judiciary Committee and which shed light on how the "Arkansas Project" came about. I should note that within minutes of discovery of these documents, copies were made and delivered to Senator HATCH's Judiciary Committee office.

Finally, the Committee staff made efforts to conduct an interview of Ronald Burr, the former publisher of the American Spectator and a key witness to the events in question. In fact, Mr. Burr was the person at the magazine instrumental in obtaining the grant funds from conservative billionaire Richard Mellon Scaife. Among the anonymous-source documents released by Senator HATCH is a December 2, 1993 letter from Richard M. Scaife to R. Emmett Tyrrell, as President and Chairman of the American Spectator Educational Foundation, stating that "[t]his grant is in response to Ron Burr's October 13, 1993 letter and various conversations with us." In addition, Mr. Burr was the person to whom Mr. Olson sent his February 18, 1994 letter confirming the terms of his representation of the American Spectator and his January 30, 1996 letter confirming his acceptance of a membership on the board of the American Spectator Educational Foundation. Unfortunately, Committee staff were unable to speak to Mr. Burr, despite his willingness to do so because the American Spectator refused to release him from the confidentiality provision in his severance agreement for purposes of Mr. Burr's cooperation with the Committee's inquiry.

CONTRADICTIONS AND DISCREPANCIES

Let me describe just a few of the discrepancies in Mr. Olson's evolving statements to this Committee. These are discrepancies that give me pause.

First, Mr. Olson has minimized his knowledge of the "Arkansas Project" and its activities through word games and definitional ploys. At the hearing, I asked him the direct question: "Were you involved in the so-called Arkansas Project at any time?" Mr. Olson responded by saying what he did not do, and with reference to his membership on the Board of Directors: "As a member of the board of directors of the American Spectator, I became aware of that. It has been alleged that I was somehow involved in that so-called project. I was not involved in the project in its origin or its management. . . . I was on the board of the American Spectator later on when the allegations about the project were simply that it did exist." (Tr. at pp. 200-01).

Why is there reason to suspect that Mr. Olson's role was not limited to that of a Member of the Board to which a financial audit was provided in 1998? A good deal of the basis is provided by subsequent answers provided by Mr. Olson himself. In April, 2001, his testimony was initially that he was not involved, except as a Member of the Board. Over the past several weeks and several rounds of questions, Mr. Olson has expanded his initial response to admit that he and his firm provided legal services in connection with the matter, that he had discussions in "social" settings with those working on "Arkansas Project" matters, and that he himself authored articles for the magazine paid for out of Scaife's special "Arkansas Project" fund.

Compare, for example, Mr. Olson's initial response with his subsequent responses in which he modified his original answer. In his May 9, 2001 letter to me, he stated: "First, I will address again your questions concerning my involvement in the 'Arkansas Project.' My only involvement in what has been characterized as the 'Arkansas Project' was in connection with my service to the Foundation as a lawyer and member of its Board of Directors." [Underlining added for emphasis.] Mr. Olson initially left out any reference to his role as a lawyer.

Mr. Olson and his supporters then began to engage in a word game over what the meaning of "Arkansas Project" is. His law partner Douglas Cox told the Post that Olson testified that he, "did not know there was this special fund set up by Scaife to finance this Arkansas fact work." That might have explained Mr. Olson's testimony if he had said that at the time he was writing the articles and giving legal advice and talking about these matters with the staff, he had been unaware that those conversations were in connection with what came to be known as the "Arkansas Project." But that is not what Mr. Olson testified. In fact, he admitted that he became aware of the "Arkansas Project" at least by 1998, and then changed that testimony to sometime in 1997. He said he was a Member of the Board that received an audit of the Scaife funds. So by 2001, his knowledge of the "Arkansas Project" and the funding by Scaife was undeniable.

On this particular definitional point, Mr. Olson has minimized his role in and his knowledge of how the Scaife money was spent by the Foundation, even though he was on the board. It strains credulity that he did not know given the size of the Scaife grants—especially when another board member has described briefings to the board on the Arkansas Project and its financing as "routine." [Peter Hannaford, Washington Post, May 15, 2001]. Moreover, board minutes for a meeting on May 19, 1997, which were included in the anonymous-source documents released by Senator HATCH on May 22, indicate that the board—at least at that meeting—discussed a number of financial matters, such as the foundation's equity holdings, operating reserves, employment contracts, and commitments from the Scaife Foundation. (Doc. pp. 44-46).

This is certainly not the first occasion that Mr. Olson has played this word game. Independent Counsel Robert W. Ray notes in response to a request from Senator HATCH, that in a memorandum of interview, Mr. Olson acknowledged that "he may have been asked questions by [names redacted] about things that they were doing in Arkansas, but Olson did not know anything about the 'Arkansas Project'" and "he was not involved in the direction of funding of that project." Mr. Olson was precise in his denial of knowledge and involvement to refer to the term "Arkansas Project." One unnamed person interviewed by the OSR investigation stated, however, that "the 'Arkansas Project' was not a term used by [name redacted] or anyone else at the American Spectator to his knowledge." (May 21 Ray Letter, n. 2).

But even accepting Mr. Olson's strict definition of the "Arkansas Project," which apparently requires knowledge of the Scaife funding source, rather than the broader use of the term to describe the general activities of Clinton scandal mongering underway at the American Spectator from 1993 through 1998, his involvement was more than he described. On Friday, May 11, 2001, the New York Times reported that Mr. Olson said that when he joined the Board of Directors of the American Spectator the "Arkansas Project" was underway and that when he found out about it, he helped shut it down. In fact, Mr. Olson's testimony to the Committee was that he was on the Board, "when the allegations about the project were simply that it did exist. The publisher at the time, under the supervision of the board of directors, hired a major independent accounting firm to conduct an audit to report to the publisher and therefore to the board of directors with respect to how that money was funded. . . . As a result of that investigation, the magazine, while it felt it had the right to conduct those kind of investigations, decided that it was not in the best interest of the magazine to do so. It ended the project. It established rules to restrict that kind of activity in the future. . . ."

In a subsequent written response, Mr. Olson wrote: "Neither the report by Mr. [Terry] Eastland nor the Board found anything unlawful about the manner in which funds had been spent, which as I recall, had all been for the purpose of investigating and reporting information of legitimate public interest regarding a high level public official. However, because of the controversy surrounding the matter, and issues regarding whether the journalistic products that resulted had been worth the amount spent, the project was ended and the Board adopted new guidelines to govern investigative journalistic efforts in the future."

The letter is interesting on these points, but only adds to the questions rather than resolving what in fact happened. Mr. Eastland adds another perspective and indicates a much more active role for Mr. Olson than had previously been acknowledged in representations to the Committee. Mr. Eastland writes that in June, 1997, disagreements arose between the magazine's "then publisher" and Richard Larry, the executive director of the Scaife foundations.

Mr. Eastland continues: "At that time, Mr. Tyrrell, who was also chairman of the board, asked Mr. Olson, a board member since 1996, for his assistance in resolving the dispute." This role has never previously been acknowledged by Mr. Olson or Mr. Tyrrell. Mr. Eastland then asserts that "Mr. Olson agreed that a review of the project was necessary." He continues: "Throughout my review, which included an accounting of the monies spent on the project as well as an examination of its management, methods, and results, I had Mr. Olson's strong support." So, according to Mr. Eastland, Mr. Olson had a much more extensive role in deciding how the American Spectator would "resolve" the dispute, contributed to the decision to conduct a review and played a strong supportive role in the review.

If Mr. Olson is now taking credit for finding out about the "Arkansas Project" and for shutting it down, as reported by the New York Times on May 11, 2001, that would be a modification of those responses and his initial response that he was not involved in the project, "in its origin or its management," to his later formulation that he did, "not recall giving any advice concerning the conduct of the 'Project' or its origins or management," to his later formulation that he was not involved in its, "inception, organization or ongoing supervision," or alternatively, that his, "only involvement in what has been characterized as the 'Arkansas Project' was in connection with my service to the Foundation as a lawyer and member of its Board of Directors."

Of course, there is much left unsaid by Mr. Eastland on this and other topics. For example, he does not indicate how he came to be the publisher of the American Spectator and replaced Ronald Burr in November 1997 or whether Mr. Olson had a role in his recruitment or in that action of replacing the publisher. In this regard, Mr. Olson did not indicate to the Committee in his submitted responses to our questionnaire that he had been an officer at the American Spectator Educational Foundation. In written follow up questions, I drew his attention to passages in The Hunting of the President (Id.) in which the authors of that published work indicate that Mr. Olson was named an officer of the organization on October 1997. Mr. Olson's response is uncertain and equivocal indicating that he had a,

"vague recollection that [he] served as a temporary secretary for the purpose of that meeting, and perhaps a subsequent one, something that I did not recall at the time I answered the initial written questions."

Second, evidence uncovered during the Committee's limited bipartisan inquiry following the Committee vote, raises serious question about whether Mr. Olson accurately denied any role in the "origin" of the "Arkansas Project" by failing to respond correctly to direct questions about a meeting in his law office held in late December, 1993 when this project was getting organized.

The anonymous-source documents released by Senator HATCH reveal that following requests by the American Spectator as early as October 13, 1993, Richard M. Scaife on December 2, 1993 "approved a new grant to The American Spectator Educational Foundation, Inc." and forwarded the first installment of the grant. (Doc. p. 19). Thus, by late December 1993, the Scaife funding was in place at the American Spectator to support the activities that would come to be called the "Arkansas Project."

With the Scaife funding secured, the OSR Report confirms that Mr. Olson met in his office in late December 1993 with people associated with the American Spectator—Ronald Burr, maybe David Henderson, Stephen Boynton and David Hale. (OSR Report, pp. 78, 82, 90; May 21, Joint Q. 5). "[A]t least seven individuals were identified as having possibly been in attendance." (Id.) Mr. Olson recalled this meeting in 1998 during the OSR investigation, stating that "in approximately December 1993" he hosted a meeting in his office, that the meeting was "about the possibility that he provide counsel to the magazine," that David Hale attended this meeting, and that "the participants may have discussed Hale's need for a 'Washington lawyer' to represent him if he was called to testify before any congressional committees." (OSR Report, pp. 28, 78).

While the description of what discussions may have taken place at this meeting is "incomplete and inconsistent" with "inconsistencies not resolved by the Shaheen investigation" (May 21 Ray Response to Joint Q. 5), the OSR report contains the following descriptions from other participants in the meeting: "while Hale may have been a topic of conversation during this meeting, no one requested Olson to represent Hale" (p. 82); "[Redacted] recalled meeting with attorneys Theodore Olson and [redacted] to discuss the representation of David Hale, . . ." (P. 90). Mr. Ray has identified these references likely to be to the same December 1993 meeting. (May 21 Ray Response to Joint Qs. 5, 7, 9).

In addition to these limited descriptions in the OSR Report, Independent Counsel Ray reviewed the underlying memoranda of interviews of three participants in the December 1993 meeting in Mr. Olson's office and summarized their statements in a May 21 letter responding to a question sent unilaterally by Senator HATCH. According to Mr. Ray, whose cooperation during this bipartisan inquiry has been exemplary and helpful, Mr. Olson admitted that at this meeting David Hale's need for counsel was discussed and that this meeting was "the commencement of [my] relationship with the American Spectator magazine" but he declined to describe the substance of that discussion, claiming the attorney/client privilege." (Id., p. 2). It is difficult to see, however, how the meeting could be covered by attorney/client privilege when David Hale, who had no formal affiliation with the Spectator, was present.

One unnamed participant confirms part of Mr. Olson's recollection, stating, "the purpose of the meeting was to get Olson to represent Hale." Another unnamed participant appears to confirm the other part of Mr. Olson's recollection regarding the second purpose of the meeting about American Spectator activities, stating: "The subject of this meeting was Bill and Hillary Clinton and the need for the Spectator to investigate and report on numerous alleged Clinton scandals." (Emphasis supplied).

Having seen the OSR Report and a statement submitted by Michael Horowitz, I am led to wonder whether the account of a late 1993 or early 1994 meeting in the Washington law office of Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher attended by David Henderson, Steve Boynton, John Mintz, Ronald Burr, Ted Olson and Michael Horowitz in The Hunting of the President (J. Conason & G. Lyons, 2000) is more accurate than we have been led to believe by Mr. Olson. At his hearing, I had asked Mr. Olson whether there had been any meetings of the "Arkansas project" in his office and he responded without reservation: "No, there were none."

I followed up with a written question asking in particular about the time frame of 1993 and 1994, and Mr. Olson answered that he was, "not aware of any meeting organizing, planning or implementing the 'Arkansas Project' in my law firm in 1993 or 1994." I then followed up by drawing his attention to a passage out of The Hunting of the President (Id.) in which the authors of that book wrote that a meeting did take place at which the topic was using Scaife funds and the American Spectator to, "mount a series of probes into the Clintons and their alleged crimes in Arkansas." In response to that written question, Mr. Olson was less assertive and categorical. He did not deny that a meeting took place but disputed the characterization of the topic of the meeting. Hedging his testimony, he noted that he did, "not recall the meeting described."

With respect to Mr. Olson's initial categorical denial of meeting at Gibson Dunn's offices, in response to another written follow up question derived from a passage in The Hunting of the President (Id.), I asked whether there had, in fact been meetings not only in 1993 and 1994 but also in July 1997 at the offices of Mr. Olson's law firm to discuss allegations that money for the "Arkansas Project" had been misallocated. Confronted with the specific reference to the public record, Mr. Olson modified his earlier categorical denial by conceding: "I do recall meetings, which I now realize must have been in the summer of 1997 in my office regarding allegations regarding what became known as the 'Arkansas Project' and questions concerning whether expenditures involved in that project had been properly documented."

Third, Mr. Olson has apparently down-played his involvement in the development and direction of "Arkansas Project" stories, perhaps to avoid any inconsistency with his initial representation to the Committee that he was not involved in the management of this project.

Yet, according to a published report in the Washington Post on May 10, 2001, the report to which Senator HATCH referred when he indicated that "legitimate questions" had been raised, David Brock told Post reporters that "Olson attended a number of dinner meetings at the home of R. Emmett Tyrrell, Jr., president and chairman of the Spectator, which were explicitly 'brainstorming' sessions about the Arkansas Project." While Mr. Olson refused to respond to this allegation, his law partner, Douglas Cox, who worked on the Spectator account, conceded that Olson attended such dinners, but that "did not mean that he was aware of the scope of the 'Arkansas Project' and the Scaife funding."

David Brock has also indicated that Mr. Olson was "directly involved in the Arkansas Project, participating in discussions about possible stories and advising the magazine whether to publish one of its most controversial stories, about the death of Clinton White House deputy counsel Vincent Foster." Washington Post, May 11, 2001. According to the account in the Post, Mr. Olson told Mr. Brock that, "while he didn't place any stock in the piece, it was worth publishing because the role of the Spectator was to write Clinton scandal stories in hopes of 'shaking scandals loose.'" In his response to Senator HATCH, Mr. Olson did not deny Mr. Brock's account head on. Instead, he wrote that he told Mr. Brock that the article did not appear to be libelous or to raise any legal issues that would preclude its publication, and that he was not going to tell the editor-in-chief what should appear in the magazine.

The Washington Post also reported that both R. Emmett Tyrrell and Wladyslaw Pleszczynski said that project story ideas, legal issues involving the stories, and other directly related matters were discussed with Mr. Olson by staff members and at dinner parties of Spectator staff and board members. The reaction from Mr. Olson's supporters was swift. On May 15, 2001, Senator HATCH shared with us a letter he obtained from Messrs. Tyrrell and Pleszczynski denying the specific words in the Post story but not denying that they talked to the Post reporters. Indeed, the Post story quotes Mr. Tyrrell, a quote he does not disavow, as saying he did not recall, but it was a possibility that he talked to Ted Olson about the stories about the Clintons. "I would say it was a possibility, just as it was a possibility that Roosevelt would have discussed Pearl Harbor on December 8 with his secretary of state." Tyrrell and Pleszczynski also say that Mr. Olson's carefully worded disclaimer was technically accurate as far as it went.

In a blatant effort to undermine Mr. Brock's powerful, first-hand recollection of Mr. Olson's participation in and contributions to the activities of the "Arkansas Project," Mr. Tyrrell also submitted a statement that Mr. Brock was not a part of the "Arkansas Project." Mr. Brock, in reply, submitted strong contradictory evidence to the Tyrrell statement and supplied the committee with multiple Arkansas Project expense reports which remain unrefuted and which Mr. Brock states, "clearly show that I was reimbursed thousands of dollars by the Project for travel, office supplies, postage, and the like."

Over the course of the past few weeks, Mr. Olson has downplayed any significance of discussions in social settings about the stories that were the product of the "Arkansas Project." In his May 9, 2001, letter, Mr. Olson acknowledged: "Your previous questions asked about contacts that I may have had with people involved in the project. My answer was and is that I had dealings with the editors of the magazine and some of its reporters and staff, some social, some in connection with legal work. This was during a time when those persons were involved in one form or another with the investigative journalistic efforts which the magazine was contemporaneously pursuing. I was, of course, aware, along with the public generally, that the magazine was writing articles about the Clintons, but I did not know that there was a special source of funding for these efforts."

In his May 14, 2001, letter to Senator HATCH, he writes: "It was also true that in social settings, the magazine's editorial staff and writers spoke of the articles that they were involved in writing and publishing. I was among scores of people from time to time included in such social events, but nothing about these social discussions involved organizing, supervising or managing the project—they were simply discussions of subjects of contemporaneous interest to the magazine's editors and writers."

Yet, taken as a whole, Mr. Olson was clearly involved and participated both professionally and socially in the work of the American Spectator and its "Arkansas Project." There is absolutely nothing illegal about this involvement and participation, but it shows a larger role in these activities than Mr. Olson initially portrayed.

Fourth, Mr. Olson minimized his role in the "Arkansas Project" and the American Spectator by failing to give complete information about the amount of remuneration he has received for his activities on their behalf when he was first asked. He told us on April 19 that he was paid from $500 to $1,000 for his articles that appeared in the American Spectator magazine. Yet, we find out in the Washington Post on May 10 that his firm was paid over $8,000 for work that was used in just one of those articles. In addition, the Post reported that over $14,000 was paid to Mr. Olson's law firm and attributed by American Spectator to the "Arkansas Project."

When he was asked during his hearing about an article he had coauthored that was published under the pseudonym "Solitary, Poor, Nasty, Brutish and Short" in the American Spectator magazine he did not indicate that "the magazine hired [his] firm to prepare" such materials and to perform legal research on the theoretical criminal exposure of the President and Mrs. Clinton based on press accounts of their conduct. I, for one, thought Mr. Olson had defended his writings as matters of personal First Amendment political expression. I had no idea from his testimony at his confirmation hearing that this article was part of his and his firm's ongoing legal representation of American Spectator Educational Foundation, that it was a commissioned piece of legal writing, paid for by a grant from conservative billionaire Richard Mellon Scaife. I am now left to wonder whether his article that was so critical of the Attorney General and the Justice Department was as he described them at his hearing the "statements of a private citizen," or another richly paid for political tract.

Mr. Tyrrell and Mr. Pleszczynski do not deny that Mr. Olson was paid for the chart speculating on the Clintons' potential criminal exposure. Instead, they merely repeat the mantra that even if he was paid with "Arkansas Project" funds, Mr. Olson would not have known that. What they leave out is a necessary qualifier, "at the time he received the payment." They and Mr. Olson became privy to the internal audit of the "Arkansas Project" by 1998. That audit and his knowledge as a Board Member of the extent of the "Arkansas Project" it revealed render Mr. Olson's testimony in April, 2001, less than complete.

I have inquired of Mr. Olson what his and his firm's legal representation of the American Spectator entailed. In response he has been extremely general, vague and unspecific and, at times, has cloaked his nonresponsiveness in allusions to the attorney-client privilege. In fact, his law partner, Douglas Cox, has acknowledged that he and Mr. Olson worked on legal matters for the American Spectator, including legal research that was incorporated into the article that was published in 1994 in the American Spectator, under a fictitious name, that argues that the President was facing up to 178 years in prison and Mrs. Clinton had a criminal exposure of 47 years in prison. He then proceeds to undercut any claim of attorney-client privilege for these activities by indicating that they did not rely on any communications with anyone at American Spectator.

Having now conceded his involvement in these matters, something he did not do initially, the question arises: how extensive was that involvement as a lawyer? That is why I asked at least for production of his firm's billing records for legal services rendered to the American Spectator, but was stonewalled on that request. Mr. Olson asserted attorney-client privilege; he did not offer to cooperate by producing non-privileged copies of those records. (April 25 Response, Q.4; May 9 Response, p. 3). Such records have been produced in connection with other government inquiries.

As part of the bipartisan inquiry undertaken after the Committee vote on this nomination, we became aware of this fact. The May 28, 1999 transmittal letter for the December 9, 1998 OSR Report indicates that request were made to Mr. Olson and his law firm, Bigson Dunn & Crutcher (GD&C) for billing records for any client that had received Scaife foundation grants between 1992-1998 in order to ascertain whether there had "been an indirect method to compensate GD&C for its unpaid representation of Hale." Just as here, GD&C initially invoked attorney-client privilege but ultimately non-privileged billing records for Mr. Olson's and GD&C's representation of both David Hale and the American Spectator were produced. (May 21 Ray Response to Joint A. 1). However, the independent counsel was unable to forward those records in response to the bipartisan, joint request for them from Senator HATCH and myself.

Accordingly, Senator HATCH and I then sent a joint request to Mr. Olson's firm requesting information about the total amount of fees paid by the American Spectator to the firm. On May 24,

Mr. Cox informed us by letter that the amount paid over the course of five and one-half years for legal services performed is $94,405. That is a far different number than the $500 to $1,000 per article the Committee was first told by Mr. Olson.

Fifth, Mr. Olson has tried to distance himself from the most controversial aspects of the "Arkansas Project" in its activities to publicize allegations of wrongdoing about the Clintons in Arkansas. Mr. Olson stated that he "represented the American Spectator in the performance of legal services from time to time beginning in 1994 . . . those legal services were not for the purpose of conducting or assisting in the conduct of investigations of the Clintons." (April 25th Responses, Q. 4). Yet, we find out he was paid over $8,000 to prepare a chart outlining the Clintons' criminal exposure as research for a February 1994 article Mr. Olson co-authored against the Clintons entitled, "Criminal laws Implicated by the Clinton Scandals: A partial list."

Finally, Mr. Olson has testified he simply does not recall who contacted him to represent David Hale. When I asked Mr. Olson at his April 5 hearing how he came to represent Mr. Hale he started by saying, "[t]wo of [Hale's] then lawyers contacted me and asked" A few seconds later Mr. Olson said, "[o]ne of his lawyers contacted me—I can't recall the man's name—and asked whether I would be available to represent Mr. Hale in connection with that subpoena here in Washington, D.C. They felt that they needed Washington counsel with some experience dealing with a congressional investigation. I did agree to do that. Mr. Hale and I met together."

Even in his May 9 letter, Mr. Olson asserts that he, "cannot recall when [he] was first contacted about the possibility of representing Mr. Hale." He indicates that he believes, "that [he] was contacted by a person or persons whose identities [he] cannot presently recall sometime before then regarding whether I might be willing to represent Mr. Hale if he needed representation in Washington. As I recall, I indicated at the time that I might be able to do so, but only in connection with a potential congressional subpoena, not with respect to legal matters pending in Arkansas. . . . I believe that this meeting was inconclusive because Mr. Hale did not at that time need representation in Washington."

The Washington Post reported that David Henderson said that he introduced Hale to Olson when Hale came to Washington to find a lawyer who could help him deal with a subpoena from the Senate Whitewater committee, and sat in on a meeting between the two men. Interestingly, David Henderson apparently signed a statement on May 14 indicating that in his view he broke no law while implementing the "Arkansas Project." What he does not say and what he does not deny is that he was the person who introduced David Hale to Mr. Olson. The role that David Henderson played in introducing David Hale to Mr. Olson is apparently corroborated by several other witnesses who have spoken to the American Prospect in a story released on May 24.

It now strikes me as strange that a man as capable as Mr. Olson with his vast abilities of recall could not remember the name of David Henderson, if Mr. Henderson was, in fact, involved in setting up that representation. It strikes me as doubly strange when the bipartisan inquiry conducted after the Committee vote on this nomination uncovered evidence that Mr. Olson was able to recall who introduced him to David Hale just a couple of years ago when asked the same question.

The OSR Report indicates that in 1998 Mr. Olson recalled who referred David Hale to him for legal representation, stating: "Hale became a client of Olson's firm around November 1995. Olson believes that Hale may have been referred to him by [redacted]." (OSR Report, p. 79).

It leads one to wonder whether Mr. Olson's failure to recall the name David Henderson had something to do with his not wanting to indicate the connection to such a central figure in the "Arkansas Project." Indeed, it has been reported that when Mr. Olson became a Member of the Board of Directors of the American Spectator his January 1996 letter accepting the position was addressed to the publisher Ronald Burr with copies sent to Messrs. Tyrrell and Henderson. Mr. Henderson says in his recent statement that he served for a while on the Spectator Board. But why was he, in particular, sent a copy? One explanation is that Mr. Olson has a selective memory and that he did not recall Mr. Henderson as the person who contacted him to represent David Hale because that would simply be another tie to the "Arkansas Project." But we may never know for sure.

On this point regarding how Mr. Olson came to represent Mr. Hale, and Mr. Olson's testimony to the Committee about it, Michael J. Horowitz submitted a statement that says that he, Mr. Horowitz, "attended one meeting in Mr. Olson's presence at which the matter discussed was legal representation for David Hale, who was facing Congressional testimony and was in need of distinguished Washington counsel. At that meeting—at which no mention I know of was made of the 'Arkansas Project' or any term like it—the subject under discussion was whether Mr. Olson's firm would serve as counsel to Mr. Hale."

It is entirely unclear in what capacity Mr. Horowitz was attending such a meeting, but it may not have been quite as simple as one or two lawyers then representing Mr. Hale approaching a high profile Washington lawyer and his instantaneous agreement to accept the representation for a client without a retainer and without much prospect of being paid after. According to Mr. Olson, he and Mr. Hale "met together" and Mr. Hale agreed to pay [Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher's] fees." In the end, Mr. Hale could not pay the $140,000 in legal fees he owed Mr. Olson.

Fitness to be Solicitor General. Some have said, why is this important? Does this matter whether he accurately and fully described his role in the American Spectator and the "Arkansas Project"? It is important for two reasons, both of which go to the core of the fitness of the nominee to serve as Solicitor General. The principle question raised by the nomination of Mr. Olson to this particular position is whether his partisanship over the last several years in connection with so many far reaching anti-Clinton efforts mark Mr. Olson as a thoroughgoing partisan who will not be able to check his partisan political instincts at the door to the Office of the Solicitor General. Similar questions were raised by the nomination of Michael Chertoff. In that case the questions were answered and the doubts dissipated. In connection with the Olson nomination, those doubts have grown over time.

Had Mr. Olson conceded the extent of his involvement in anti-Clinton activities and given the kinds of assurances that Mr. Chertoff did about his upcoming responsibilities, I would be supporting his confirmation. Indeed, when I met with Mr. Olson and at his hearing, I hoped and expected that to be my position. I expected to be able to give him the benefit of the doubt and, in light of the deference I would normally accord a President's Executive Branch nominees, I fully expected to be voting for this nomination.

In the wake of the hearing, the series of supplemental responses we have received and the unanswered questions now in the public record about Mr. Olson's involvement in partisan activities like the "Arkansas Project," I still have my doubts.

Second is the question of candor and straightforwardness. I have not had the sense from his hearing onward that Mr. Olson has been truly forthcoming with me or with the Committee. My sense is that for some reason he chose from the outset to try to minimize his role in connection with the activities of the American Spectator, that he has sought to characterize it in the most favorable possible light, that he has sought to conclude for us rather than provide us with the facts and let us conclude how to view his activities.

I will cite another example of non-responsiveness from the record. I asked Mr. Olson in light of his testimony at the hearing that he was not involved in the origins or management of the 'Arkansas Project': "Were you involved in advising anyone who was involved in the origins or management of the project? If so, what advice did you provide? Were you at meetings or social events with anyone involved in the project as an originator, manager, reporter, or source for the project? If so, what role did you play at these meetings or social events?"

Mr. Olson's response was, as follows:

"I did not realize that a Project of any sort was underway except to the extent that I have indicated. I was in contact at social events with reporters for the magazine and members of the editorial staff, individuals whom I regard as personal friends. I have been at countless social events at which one or more of such persons may have been present. I have not kept records of such meetings, or the nature of the conversations that may have occurred at such meetings that might have involved President Clinton or his contemporaneous or past conduct. I was not playing any particular role at those social events, except that I was probably a host of events at which persons who wrote for or performed editorial services for the American Spectator may have been present. To the extent that it is relevant to your inquiry, I was the best man at the wedding of the editor-in-chief of the American Spectator. I recall that he was also present at my wedding. He is a personal friend and we have had numerous social meetings. He has written at least two books about former President Clinton. I do not interpret your inquiry as asking for the substance of conversations at social events. And I do not recall giving any advice concerning the conduct of the 'Project' or its origins or management.

Literally true? Probably. Responsive? Hardly. At the time of his hearing and his answer, Mr. Olson was well aware of the activities of the "Arkansas Project," which was operated by the organization for which he acted as lawyer, author and contributor, Board Member and officer. He had been presented with an audit and played a pivotal role in reviewing the examination of its management, methods and results, according to Mr. Eastland. His answer, however, steers clear of perjury without responding to the concerns being raised. It relies on a lack of recollection and is an attempt at distraction.

Conclusion. As I review this record and the initial nonresponsiveness, lack of recall, corrections when confronted with specifics, I am left to wonder what happened to "absolute candor and fair dealing." In concluding my May 4, 2001, letter to Mr. Olson I noted: "The credibility of the person appointed to be the Solicitor General is of paramount importance. When arguing in front of the Supreme Court on behalf of the United States Government, the Solicitor General is expected to come forward with both the strengths and weaknesses of the case, to inform the Court of things it might not otherwise know, and to be honest in all his or her dealings with the Court. I expect that same responsiveness and cooperation from nominees before this Committee." My expectations have been disappointed.

I understand the role of a lawyer-advocate in our legal system, and I did not intend to oppose this nomination merely because of Mr. Olson's clients and his clients' activities. If confirmed, however, Mr. Olson's next client will be the United States of America—and all of us. I want to be sure that our nation's top lawyer will see the truth and speak the truth fully to the Supreme Court and represent all of our best interests in the weighty matters over which the Solicitor General exercises public authority. Based upon what I have seen I do not have the requisite confidence in Mr. Olson to be able to support his nomination. I will vote no.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I agree with my colleague from Vermont that the Solicitor General must be a person of the highest integrity. This is very important if the Solicitor General is to represent the interests of all Americans and to be a valuable assistant to the Supreme Court. Mr. Olson himself acknowledged this high standard in his testimony to the committee.

I believe that Mr. Olson has exemplified this high level of candor and integrity in all of his dealings with the committee.

Some of my colleagues have alleged that Mr. Olson misdirected the committee in his answers. But this is simply untrue. Mr. Olson told us what he did with the American Spectator and the Arkansas Project. He wrote several articles for that magazine—copies of these articles were all provided to the committee with Mr. Olson's questionnaire. Mr. Olson also told us that he was on the board of the magazine and became aware of the Arkansas Project in 1997. He has not attempted to hide any of these activities from the committee. Rather he has cooperated fully, submitting numerous responses to questions from members of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. Olson enjoys the support of many prominent liberal scholars and lawyers, as I have detailed already. Many of his colleagues at the Office of Legal Counsel have attested to his fairness and his consummate ability to serve as a government lawyer in a nonpartisan manner.

Indeed, many of the allegations against Mr. Olson have arisen from reports in The Washington Post. But the Post has advocated the confirmation of Mr. Olson.

Mr. Olson is one of the most qualified nominees ever for the position of Solicitor General. I hope that this body will confirm him today so that he can begin his important work litigating on behalf of the United States.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the following letters we have received in support of Mr. Olson. These include letters from Robert Bennett, Larry Simms, Michael Horowitz, James Ring Adams, Terry Eastland, Floyd Abrams, Laurence Tribe, William Webster, R. Emmett Tyrell, Wladyslaw Pleszczynski, Douglas Cox, David Henderson, and Stephen Boynton. These letters demonstrate the depth and breadth of the support for Mr. Olson's nomination.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Hon. ORRIN G. HATCH,
Chairman, Senate Judiciary Committee, U.S.
Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR HATCH: I write this letter in support of the appointment of Ted Olson as Solicitor General of the United States.

Our country is blessed with many wonderful lawyers of all political persuasions. In making judgments about their selection for high office, we must look beyond their political labels and pick the best qualified. The Ted Olson that I know and respect would be a great Solicitor General. I am confident that he will obey and enforce the law with skill, integrity and impartiality. The American people would be most fortunate to have such a skillful and honest advocate representing the United States before the Supreme Court.

Several years ago when I was the State Chair of the American College of Trial Lawyers for the District of Columbia, it was my responsibility to help select for admission to the College the very best advocates—those who were the most skilled, dedicated and honest. At the top of my list was Ted Olson. Ted, because of his stellar qualifications and reputation for integrity, sailed through the selection process. Those who supported him were liberals, moderates and conservatives of all stripes.

While I do not have any personal knowledge as to what role, if any, Mr. Olson played in the "Arkansas Project" or the full extent of his relationship with the American Spectator, what I do know is that Ted Olson is a truth-teller and you can rely on his representations regarding these matters. Moreover, I agree with Senator Leahy that the credibility of the individual appointed to be Solicitor General is of paramount importance. In my view, based on the many years I have known him, Ted Olson is such an individual. He is a man of great personal integrity and credibility and should be confirmed.

Sincerely,

ROBERT S. BENNETT.

Re the nomination of Theodore B. Olson to be the Solicitor General of the United States

Hon. ORRIN HATCH,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S.
Senate, Washington, DC.

Hon. PATRICK J. LEAHY,
Ranking Minority Member, Senate Judiciary Committee, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATORS HATCH AND LEAHY: This letter is being sent to the Committee in connection with the nomination of Theodore B. Olson to become the Solicitor General of the United States. It is written in the context of an apparent controversy regarding the truthfulness of particular testimony given by Mr. Olson at his confirmation hearing before the Committee. I have had no involvement whatsoever in Mr. Olson's preparation for that hearing, I have not reviewed a transcript of that hearing, and I have not discussed the substance of this controversy with Mr. Olson or anyone who may be assisting Mr. Olson in this matter. Indeed, my universe of asserted facts regarding this controversy is limited to my review of two or possibly three articles printed recently in The Washington Post that were brought to my attention by a former associate of Gibson, Dunn in a purely social communication. This letter has not been, nor will it be, reviewed or seen by anyone other than word processing personnel before it is delivered to the Committee, although I am providing a copy of it to Mr. Olson as a matter of courtesy.

I understand the central concern of the Committee to be the truthfulness and integrity that Mr. Olson would bring to the presentation of the position of the United States in cases brought before the Supreme Court or other cases within the ambit of the authority of the Solicitor General. I share the view that there should be no doubt about the ability and integrity of any nominee to this position to present the Government's position with honesty and integrity. When this sort of issue arises in this town, it is customary for the record to be filled, often to overflowing, with letters extolling the integrity of the nominee whose ability to serve with the requisite integrity has been challenged. I doubt that such testimonials are particularly helpful to the Committee, I would, instead, like to bring to the attention of the Committee three instances in which I worked with Mr. Olson on matters that demanded precisely the kind of intellectual integrity that should be displayed by any Solicitor General and in which Mr. Olson displayed that integrity under what can only be characterized as battlefield conditions. First, I should provide the Committee with some relevant information about myself.

I graduated from the Boston University School of Law in 1973, having spent four years as an officer in the U.S. Navy after my graduation from Dartmouth College in 1966. I grew up in Tennessee, campaigned for the late Senator Albert Gore, Sr. in his last campaign in 1970, and I am a Democrat. In 1973-74, I served as a law clerk to Circuit Judge James L. Oakes of the Second Circuit. In 1974-75, I served as law clerk to Associate Justice Byron R. White of the Supreme Court. In 1975-76, I served as Counsel to the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press and began teaching a First Amendment seminar as an adjunct professor of the Georgetown Law Center, a course I taught until 1985. In June 1976, I was hired by Antonin Scalia, then the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Office of Legal Counsel of the Department of Justice ("OLC"), as an attorney-adviser. In 1979, I was appointed Deputy Assistant Attorney General in OLC by Attorney General Bell. I was the only remaining Deputy Assistant in OLC when the first Reagan Administration took office in January, 1981, and I continued to serve in that capacity until February 1985. Mr. Olson was the Assistant Attorney General in charge of OLC from his confirmation in 1981 through the fall of 1984. We worked closely together on many issues, and I came to know him well both at the professional and personal level. I joined Gibson, Dunn as an associate in February 1985, became a partner in 1988 and have practiced appellate law with the firm for sixteen years.

Mr. Olson's handling of three major issues during his tenure as the head of OLC stands out as exemplary of his intellectual integrity. First, and as this Committee is well aware, the courts had not at that time determined the constitutionality of the legislative veto device. In addition, the Republican plank endorsed by President Reagan openly supported the legislative veto device. When he became head of OLC, Mr. Olson studied the question of the constitutionality of the legislative veto device, discussed that question at great length with me and other OLC lawyers, and concluded that legislative veto devices were, root and branch, unconstitutional. He so advised Attorney General Smith, who in turn advised President Reagan and members of the President's staff—many of whom were strongly supportive of legislative veto devices. Mr. Olson convinced the Attorney General that the issue involved was a legal issue, not a political issue, and that the law, not the plank of the Republican Party, had to be followed by everyone involved, including the President himself. This story is chronicled in Chadha: The Story of an Epic Constitutional Struggle by Professor Barbara Hankinson Craig of Wesleyan University, and I strongly commend that book to the Committee as it considers Mr. Olson's nomination.

Second, and as this Committee is also aware, there was much discussion in the early years of the first Reagan Administration about the enactment of legislation to curb the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States. Much of that discussion was initiated by the new Republican majority on this Committee. Once again, Mr. Olson was put under substantial pressure to "play ball" with the Administration and clear the Administration to endorse such legislation. Once again, he studied the issue, discussed it extensively with me and other OLC lawyers, and concluded that such legislation would probably be held unconstitutional. That opinion was reduced to writing and served as the Administration's response. No such legislation, so far as I can recall, was ever seriously considered after the Administration's position was communicated to Congress.

Third, in late 1981, I was preparing to travel to The Hague on business when I was asked by Mr. Olson for my views on the substantive issues raised in what ultimately became the famous Bob Jones case. Although I did not have much time to study those substantive issues, I advised Mr. Olson orally that I feel that the Government's position taken in that case was correct and would be vindicated by the Supreme Court. I also advised Mr. Olson that I felt strongly that the Office of the Solicitor General had an obligation to defend the statute involved in that case in the Supreme Court. By the time I returned from The Hague, the Bob Jones fiasco was playing itself out, with a decision having been made—over Mr. Olson's strong objections—that the statute would not be defended by the Solicitor General. The Supreme Court ultimately appointed William Coleman to defend the statute in that court, and Mr. Olson's position was vindicated by, as I recall, an almost unanimous decision.

This letter is written off the top of my head, so the Committee will have to forgive me for any error in any of the facts stated above that I may have made, but there is no error in my conclusion that these three examples paint the portrait of a lawyer scrupulously devoted to the law and having the personal and intellectual integrity to place the law above the politics of Washington at considerable personal risk. It is that quality, after all, that it seems to me one should look for in considering the nomination of any person to be the Solicitor General of the United States. Mr. Olson is a fierce advocate, but he is an honest advocate and a person whose integrity and devotion to the law and the rule of law have survived challenges to which very few public servants are ever subjected.

Very truly yours,

LARRY L. SIMMS.

STATEMENT OF MICHAEL J. HOROWITZ TO THE SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE

I am a Senior Fellow and Director of the Project for Civil Justice at the Hudson Institute. I served as General Counsel of OMB under President Reagan. I have known Ted Olson for 20 years and have the highest regard for him and for his professionalism, intelligence and integrity.

In fact, I have always found Mr. Olson's word to be absolutely reliable. I have disagreed with Mr. Olson from time to time on issues of policy, but I have never met a person more meticulously scrupulous on matters of principle or honesty.

Never.

I have read Mr. Olson's testimony in response to Senator Leahy's question regarding the "Arkansas Project," delivered during Mr. Olson's confirmation hearing. His testimony to Senator Leahy was, in all respects that I am aware, wholly accurate. Specifically, I know of no respect in which Mr. Olson was involved in the Project's "origin or its management."

I attended one meeting in Mr. Olson's presence at which the matter discussed was legal representation for David Hale, who was facing Congressional testimony and was in need of distinguished Washington counsel. At that meeting—at which no mention I know of was made of the "Arkansas Project" or any term like it—the subject under discussion was whether Mr. Olson's firm would serve as counsel to Mr. Hale. Put otherwise, I have never heard Mr. Olson discuss or imply that he was involved in managing or directing either anything called the Arkansas Project or any of the investigative journalistic inquiries of his client, the American Spectator Magazine.

In making the above statement, I note that I am aware of nothing to suggest that the American Spectator violated the law. Likewise, I believe it clear that the American Spectator's journalistic and investigative activities were and are fully protected by the First Amendment.

I was hired in late 1993 by the American Spectator to be the lead writer for what has come to be known as the "Arkansas Project." I originally started as a free-lance writer, but was hired onto the staff of the magazine in 1994, where I remained until January 1, 1999. My numerous articles in the Spectator, based largely on my personal reporting in Arkansas, analyzed many different aspects of Whitewater and related controversies. Over the four years or so that I worked for the Spectator, I traveled to Arkansas on roughly a monthly basis.

I understand that David Brock, who for a period was another writer for the magazine, has alleged that Mr. Theodore Olson directed or supervised the "Arkansas Project." As stated above, I was the lead writer on the Project, and Mr. Olson had absolutely no role in guiding my development of stories for the magazine or in managing my work. Indeed, I believe I only spoke to Mr. Olson once during the years in question, at the end of a widely attended dinner at a Washington, D.C. hotel, sometime in 1998, I believe. I sought him out to ask a general question about recent, publicly reported developments in the Webster Hubbell legal case. It was my impression at the time that he did not recognize me, and I had to explain who I was; we spoke only for about five minutes. Given that we had no other meetings, conversations or other communications about my work, it is false and wrong to assert that Mr. Olson had any role whatsoever in managing or directing what is referred to as the "Arkansas Project."

JAMES RING ADAMS.

MCLEAN, VA, May 14, 2001.

Hon. ORRIN HATCH,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR HATCH: I am writing to comment on matters of possible relevance to President Bush's nomination of Theodore B. Olson to be Solicitor General.

I became publisher of The American Spectator in November 1997. I was authorized by the board of directors to conduct a review of what has been called the "Arkansas Project." I completed the review in 1998 and reported my findings to the board. I also assisted investigators working under the Whitewater independent counsel, who were charged with looking into certain issues involving the project.

As I discovered soon after I began my review, the project was conceived in the fall of 1993 by Editor-in-Chief R. Emmett Tyrrell, Jr., and Richard Larry, then the executive director of the Scaife foundations. The point of the project was to place in Arkansas individuals who would look into allegations involving then Governor Bill Clinton and relate their findings to the magazine's editors and writers for their review. The project contemplated the publication of investigative pieces. Two Scaife foundations were prepared to underwrite the project, which in grant correspondence was called "the editorial improvement project."

The project was commenced in November 1993. Individuals were duly retained to conduct the "on-the-ground" researches in Arkansas, and the first editorial result of the project was an article on an aspect of Whitewater, which was published in February 1994. The project continued through the early fall of 1997, and it produced a total (by my count) of eight articles. The Scaife foundations contributed a total of approximately $2.3 million, more than $1.8 million of which underwrote the work of the individuals in Arkansas.

In my review, I found no evidence that Mr. Olson was involved in the project's creation or its conduct. My own sense is that Mr. Olson did not become aware of the project until June 1997, when disagreements arose between the magazine's then publisher and Mr. Larry over project expenditures. At that time, Mr. Tyrrell, who was also chairman of the board, asked Mr. Olson, a board member since 1996, for his assistance in resolving the dispute. When I came aboard as publisher, Mr. Olson agreed that a review of the project was necessary. Throughout my review, which included an accounting of the monies spent on the project as well as an examination of its management, methods, and results, I had Mr. Olson's strong support.

Finally, I should add that, based upon my knowledge of the magazine's financial records in general and those of the Scaife-funded project in particular, Mr. Olson never received any payments from The American Spectator for his representation of David Hale.

I hope these observations are of assistance.
Sincerely yours,

TERRY EASTLAND.

Re Ted Olson

Hon. PATRICK J. LEAHY,
Russell Senate Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR PAT: I'm not sure if Ted Olson needs a boost from the other side or not for Solicitor General, but I did want to offer one. Ted is just as conservative as his writings and clientele suggest. But on the assumption that Larry Tribe is not high on the appointment list for this Administration, I did want to say that I've known Ted since we worked together on a Supreme Court case—Metromedia v. San Diego—20 years ago and that I've always been impressed with his talent, his personal decency and his honor. He would serve with distinction as Solicitor General.

Sincerely,

FLOYD ABRAMS.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY LAW SCHOOL,
Cambridge, MA, March 5, 2001.

Hon. PATRICK J. LEAHY,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR PAT: As one who knows Ted Olson and disagrees with him on many important issues, I nonetheless write in support of his confirmation as Solicitor General.

An explanation may be called for. After all, Ted was the oral advocate who opposed me in the United States Supreme Court in the first of the two arguments between Vice President Gore and now President (then-Governor) Bush, and Ted's were the briefs that I sought to defeat in the briefs I wrote and filed for Vice President Gore in both of the two Bush v. Gore cases. Ted's views of equal protection, of Article II, and of 3 U.S.C. §5, were views I believed, and continue to believe, are wrong. Although his views of Article II and of 3 U.S.C. §5 ultimately convinced only three Justices, his overall approach to the case won the presidency for his client. It surely cannot be that anyone who took that prevailing view and fought for it must on that account be opposed for the position of Solicitor General. Because Ted Olson briefed and argued his side of the case with intelligence, with insight, and with integrity, his advocacy on the occasion of the Florida election litigation—profoundly as I disagree with him on the merits—counts for me as a "plus" in this context, not as a minus. That his views coincide with those of a current Court majority on a number of vital issues as to which my views differ deeply should not rule him out.

I am willing to believe that the five Justices who in essence decided the recent presidential election thought they were genuinely acting to preserve the rule of law and to protect the constitutional processes of democracy from being undermined by a post-election recount procedure that they viewed as chaotic, lawless and essentially rigged. I believe that view was profoundly misguided and that the Court's majority deserves severe criticism not only for its misconception of reality but also for its breathtaking failure to explain its legal conclusions in terms that could at least make sense to an informed but detached observer. But I do not lay that failing at Ted Olson's feet; he acted as a responsible (if also misguided) advocate. The blunder was the Court's own doing.

If we set Bush v. Gore aside, what remains in Ted's case is an undeniably distinguished career of an obviously exceptional lawyer with an enormous breadth of directly relevant experience. Although part of that career has been devoted to causes with which I disagree, his briefs and arguments have treated the applicable law and the underlying facts honestly and forthrightly, not disingenuously or deceptively. Ted seems to me capable of drawing the clear distinction that any Solicitor General who has been on the ramparts on various contentious issues must draw between his or her own aspirations for the directions in which the law should be pushed, and his or her best understanding of where the law presently is and where the Supreme Court ought to be nudging it, applying criteria less personal and more inclusive than those driving any individual advocate. Put simply, I write this letter in Ted Olson's support in the expectation, and on the understanding, that his testimony during his confirmation hearing, and the other evidence that the Senate Judiciary Committee will gather, will show him to be both able and willing not simply to articulate the Administration's or his own legal philosophy but to represent well the United States of America as his ultimate client before the Supreme Court, keeping a firm grip on what is best for that client and for the Constitution, not simply for the President's philosophical agenda.

Of course, any Solicitor General must speak for the Administration he or she represents and must, within limits, espouse its views. And any advocate must, to some degree, draw on his or her own views in deciding what to argue and how. But the special responsibility of the Solicitor General, both to the Court and to the country, requires an advocate with the capacity and the character, on crucial occasions, to rise above his or her Administration's pet theories and to advise the Court in ways that may not always advance the political priorities of the government. Sometimes the Solicitor General must defend the actions of Congress even when those actions were opposed by the Executive Branch. Sometimes the Solicitor General must decline to defend the actions of Congress, even when supported by the Executive, when they plainly conflict with the Constitution. Myriad examples could be given, but the general point is simple: Some advocates are too bound up in their own views, and in their duty to their immediate clients narrowly conceived, to act as counsel in this broader and higher sense. Some are too blinded by their own perspectives to see beyond them. Having observed Ted Olson in a number of situations, and having watched his career from afar, I would not expect him to be in that troublesome category. I would expect him, rather, to have the open-mindedness and breadth of perspective to meet the higher standard I am articulating here. My letter of support, at any rate, is premised on that expectation, and on the belief that the confirmation hearings will bear out that optimistic prediction.

In the end, only Ted Olson's performance in the role of Solicitor General will prove whether I am right or wrong in this hopeful evaluation. My strong sense, however, based on what I now know, is that, as Solicitor General, Ted Olson will perform his role with honor, and with distinction.

Best wishes always,

LAURENCE H. TRIBE.

WASHINGTON, DC, May 14, 2001.

Hon. ORRIN G. HATCH,
Chairman, Judiciary Committee, U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

Hon. PATRICK J. LEAHY,
Ranking Minority Member, Judiciary Committee, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR CHAIRMAN HATCH AND RANKING MINORITY MEMBER LEAHY: I write in support of the nomination of Theodore B. Olson by President Bush to be Solicitor General of the United States. I do so having the utmost confidence in his ability, his loyalty to country, his fidelity to the Constitution and his personal integrity.

My professional and personal association with Ted Olson began 20 years ago when he joined the Reagan administration and served as Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel under Attorney General William French Smith. I was, at that time, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Few positions in our government are more sensitive or important to our government and the administration of justice than is the O.L.C. Ted carried out his responsibilities with a calm and steady hand, reflecting legal acumen and common sense, both important attributes for the "Attorney General's lawyer". In staff meetings his input and advice seemed consistently sound.

In private practice I have had occasion to work with Ted on some matters of common interest and have found the same high level of competence and judgment. He is one of our nation's foremost appellate advocates and has earned widespread admiration for his analytical and advocacy skills. If he is confirmed, he will serve his country and the cause of equal justice under law with great dedication.

Ted has been a member of the Legal Advisory Committee of the National Legal Center for the Public Interest, which I chair. His periodic review of the work of the Supreme Court has been insightful and helpful.

On a more personal note, I have known Ted as a thoughtful and caring friend for many years. I believe him to be honest and trustworthy and he has my full trust. He is the kind of person I would want to turn to for help, professional or otherwise, in time of need.

Having survived five Senate confirmations of my own, I have a full awareness of the Senate's solemn responsibility to advise and consent in these matters. I do hope you will give some weight to the opinions of those who know and respect Ted Olson. The President's choice is a very good one. I would not have written this letter if I did not firmly believe this to be true.

Respectfully,

WILLIAM H. WEBSTER.

THE AMERICAN SPECTATOR,
ARLINGTON, VA, May 14, 2001.

Hon. ORRIN G. HATCH,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR HATCH: Contrary to the Washington Post's May 11 story by Thomas B. Edsall and Robert G. Kaiser, we never "said that [Arkansas] project story ideas, legal issues involving the stories produced by the project and other directly related matters were discussed with Olson by staff members, and at dinner parties of Spectator staffers and board members." Apparently they got the idea from David Brock, Edsall's main source on the Olson matter, and an individual who has repeatedly acknowledged his deep bias against Olson and his former employer The American Spectator. In quoting him, the reporters might have mentioned his compromised credentials.

Although Mr. Brock has lately claimed to have been part of the so-called Arkansas Project, he was not. The record on that is indisputable. During his time at the magazine it was clear to everyone concerned—he was very public about this—that he was not part of the project. His well-known "Troopergate" story originated and was completed before any such project existed. If he spoke to Mr. Olson during those years it was as a reporter pursuing his own stories and not as a representative of a "project" he distanced himself from. Pleszczynski made that clear to Edsall. Brock's present claim that he was calling Olson as part of the "project" is a deceit.

What is more, if Mr. Olson's firm, Gibson, Dunn and Crutcher, was paid from project funds (like all recipients of checks from The American Spectator), the firm would not have known which internal account the magazine used for its payments. For all Gibson, Dunn and Crutcher knew, the magazine was paying it from funds derived from general income.

Mr. Olson's statements that he was "not involved in the project in its origin or its management" and that he was "not involved in organizing, supervising or managing the conduct of [the magazine's investigative] efforts" are accurate and thus truthful.

One final point, the precedent set by politicians seeking to probe the methods of payment and of reportage practiced by journalists has a chilling effect on the First Amendment. We would hope other journalists would recognize this danger to journalistic endeavors.

Sincerely,

R. EMMETT TYRRELL, JR.,
Editor-in-Chief.
WLADYSŁAW PLESZCZYNSKI,
Editor, The American Spectator Online.

I am a partner in the law firm of Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher LLP. I became affiliated with the firm, originally as an "of counsel" employee, in 1993. Starting in 1994, I worked with Theodore Olson on certain legal matters for the firm's client, the American Spectator. That legal work included legal research regarding criminal laws potentially implicated by allegations of certain conduct by public officials, including President and Mrs. Clinton, as reported in the major media. That research was incorporated into an article that the American Spectator published in 1994. The magazine published the article under the by-line of "Solitary, Poor, Nasty, Brutish and Short," an obviously fictional law firm drawn from the famous quote from Hobbes, that the magazine had listed for many years on its masthead as its legal counsel. It was, however, widely known that Mr. Olson and I had prepared the material in the article.

In addition to periodic legal work for the client, Mr. Olson and I over the years co-wrote similar satiric pieces involving legal aspects of various matters involving the Clinton Administration. Some, but not all, of those pieces appeared under the "Solitary, Poor" by-line.

During my work with Mr. Olson for the American Spectator, I never heard the phrase "Arkansas Project" until it had become the subject of media reporting. I am not aware of any fact that would support or in any way credibly suggest that Mr. Olson was involved in the origin, management or supervision of the investigative journalism projects funded by one of the Scaife foundations that became known as the "Arkansas Project." In drafting our articles, I never spoke with anyone at the American Spectator to obtain any facts, relying instead on already-published media reports, and legal resources such as statutes, congressional reports, and the like.

I met David Brock years ago, and in the early 1990s on occasion I would see and speak to him at parties in the Washington, DC area. I have not spoken to Mr. Brock for years. Starting some time ago, Mr. Brock developed a marked, publicly-expressed animus toward Mr. Olson and his wife.

I chose to become affiliated with Gibson, Dunn primarily because of Mr. Olson. Although I did not know Mr. Olson personally before I interviewed with the firm, he has a reputation as one of the best lawyers in Washington, a rigorous and demanding lawyer with a record of unflinching devotion to principle. In the years since I became affiliated with the firm, I have worked closely with Mr. Olson, including participation on numerous cases for the firm's clients. I can personally vouch for his extremely high professional standards; for his refusal to accept second-best efforts from himself or anyone around him; and for his fairness. I can also vouch, without reservation, for his great integrity.

In my view, he will make an excellent Solicitor General, and the Members of the Judiciary Committee should vote to confirm him with confidence.

DOUGLAS R. COX.

We were the two individuals charged by the American Spectator with implementing what has come to be called the "Arkansas Project," an effort to support investigative journalism in Arkansas that was specially funded by Richard Mellon Scaife. (Dave Henderson also served for a while on the Spectator Board.)

In connection with our investigative research for this journalistic project, we made numerous trips to Arkansas and elsewhere to speak first-hand to witnesses. Nothing that we did in connection with the "Arkansas Project" broke the law. Mr. Shaheen, a special counsel, reached the same conclusion after an extended investigation. Rather, we were conducting the same kind of investigative journalism, talking to witnesses, reviewing documents, that many journalists do every day. Such activities were not only lawful, but encouraged in an open and free democracy, and fully protected by the First Amendment. There was nothing at all improper about the investigative fact work that we performed for the American Spectator.

In performing our investigative work for the American Spectator, we were not directed or managed in any way by Theodore Olson. He did not participate, nor was he asked to participate, in either the planning or conduct of the "Arkansas Project." Contrary assertions, made by those lacking personal knowledge and with a political or personal agenda, are simply false.

May 15, 2001.

DAVID W. HENDERSON.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. SESSIONS. Mr. President, on behalf of Senator HATCH, I yield time to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I thank my colleague from Alabama for yielding time to me. I have sought recognition to support the nomination of Theodore Olson to be Solicitor General of the United States.

Mr. Olson comes to this position with an excellent academic and professional background. He received his law degree from the University of California at Berkeley in 1965 after having received a bachelor's degree from the University of the Pacific in 1962. He practiced law with the distinguished firm of Gibson, Dunn, and Crutcher from 1965 to 1971 as an associate, and then as a partner for almost a decade, until 1981. And then from 1984 to the present time—he was Assistant Attorney General, legal counsel, for the Department of Justice from 1981 to 1984. He came in with the administration of President Reagan.

I was elected in the same year, and I knew of his work, having served on the Judiciary Committee beginning immediately after taking my oath of office after the 1980 election.

He is a real professional. He has argued some of the most important cases before the Supreme Court of the United States.

On December 11, 2000, he argued the landmark case of Gov. George W. Bush v. Vice President Albert Gore where the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States essentially decided the conflict on the Florida election. I was present that day to hear that historic argument and can attest personally to his competency and his professionalism.

There have been some concerns about his partisanship. I am confident Mr. Olson can separate partisanship from his professional responsibilities as Solicitor General of the United States. It is not surprising that President Bush would appoint a Republican to be Solicitor General, nor is it surprising that President Bush would appoint Ted Olson to this important position in light of Mr. Olson's accomplishments, his demonstration of competency, and his assistance to President Bush on that major case.

Some questions have been raised as to some answers Mr. Olson gave at the confirmation hearing. A request was made to have an investigation of some of what Mr. Olson did. I took the position publicly in interviews and then later in the Judiciary Committee executive session when we considered Mr. Olson's nomination, saying I was prepared to see and support an investigation if there was something to investigate but that there had not been any allegation of any impropriety on Mr. Olson's part in terms of any specification as to what he was supposed to have said that was inconsistent or what he was supposed to have said that was not true.

I am not totally without experience in investigative matters. But a starting point of any investigation has to be an allegation, something to investigate. That was not provided. I called at that hearing for some specification. If you make a charge, even in a civil case, there has to be particularity alleged, there has to be some specification as to what the impropriety was, let alone wrongdoing in order to warrant an investigation.

I said at the hearing, although there was a certain amount of interest in moving the nomination ahead last Thursday, that I would support an investigation and would not rush to judgment if there was something to investigate. But nothing was forthcoming to warrant an investigation. One of the Judiciary Committee members said, well, Mr. Olson was not forthcoming at the Judiciary Committee hearing. I attended that hearing in part, and there were very few Senators there. But if there was some concern that Ted Olson wasn't forthcoming, the time to go into it was at the hearing or, if not at the hearing, Mr. Olson was available thereafter.

I asked the Senator who raised the question about his not being forthcoming if he had talked to Mr. Olson, and the answer was that he had not. So based on the record, it is my conclusion that any of the generalized charges as to Mr. Olson haven't been substantiated at all, haven't been raised to the level of specification to warrant any proceeding or any investigation.

I dare say that if those on the other side of the aisle had sought to block this nomination from coming up today, there were ample procedural opportunities for them to do just that.

So on this state of the record, on the state of Ted Olson's excellent academic and professional record, and his established expertise as an advocate before the Supreme Court of the United States, and understanding the difference between partisanship when he is in a partisan context as opposed to professionalism when he is representing the United States of America before the Supreme Court, I intend to support this nomination and vote aye.

I thank the Chair. I thank my friend from Alabama, the distinguished Senator from Alabama. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SESSIONS. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania for his outstanding remarks. He does, indeed, have a passion for truth and he pursues those he believes are not telling the truth aggressively in his examination and defends those he thinks are being unfairly accused. I have seen his skill in committee hearings many times. Senator SPECTER raised a number of questions about the allegations that were made about Mr. Olson. But his questions concerning the merit of the allegations against Mr. Olson were never answered. In fact, he simply asked: "Precisely what is it you say he was testifying falsely about?" And I don't believe a satisfactory answer to this day has been given to that question.

Mr. President, I support Ted Olson's nomination to be the next Solicitor General. I commend Senators LEAHY, DASCHLE, HATCH, and LOTT for reaching an agreement to have the Olson nomination voted on today. Certain charges were made, but they have been investigated and, in my view, have been found wholly without merit. The charges were raised in a newspaper article in the Washington Post the day that the vote was scheduled on Mr. Olson's nomination. Some of the Senators questioned the article.

Subsequently, after the facts were examined, the Washington Post endorsed Ted Olson for this position. Nonetheless, Senator HATCH agreed to delay further and allow the matter to be examined even more thoroughly. That is why we are here today. Now that most of the partisan rhetoric has receded, I am glad the Senate will follow the moderate and wise voices of Professor Laurence Tribe, Robert Bennett, Beth Nolan, Floyd Abrams, and Senator ZELL MILLER in moving this nomination to confirmation.

The Solicitor General is the most important legal advocate in the country. The job has been called the greatest lawyer job in the world. As U.S. attorney for almost 15 years, I had the honor of standing up in court on a daily basis to say: "The United States is ready, Your Honor." I spoke for the United States in its Federal district court normally in the Southern District of Alabama. But what greater thrill could there be, what greater honor than to stand before the great U.S. Supreme Court and represent the greatest country in the history of the world and be the lawyer for that country in that great Court? Ted Olson is worthy of that job. He and his subordinates will shape the arguments in cases that come before the Federal appellate courts and, most importantly, before the Supreme Court of the United States. In this fashion, law is shaped slowly and carefully one case at a time over a period of years.

I note, however, that I have a slight disagreement with my distinguished colleague from Vermont on the question of this being an extraordinarily more sensitive a position than others. While it is a position that requires great skill and legal acumen, the truth is that the Solicitor General does not do a lot of things independently. Basically, the Solicitor General asks the Supreme Court, or perhaps some other lesser court if he chooses, to rule one way or the other. He is not making decisions independently about policies or procedures such as an FBI Director would make or the Deputy Attorney General or the Attorney General. He is basically in court constrained by the justices before whom he appears. And it is, as everyone knows, critical that a Solicitor General maintain over a period of years credibility with the Supreme Court. Ted Olson, as a regular practitioner before the Supreme Court of the United States, understands that and will carefully husband his credibility with that Court as he has always done.

The Solicitor General must be a constitutional scholar of the first order, a lawyer and legal advocate with broad and distinguished legal experience, and must possess unquestioned integrity. Ted Olson excels in each of these categories.

First, Mr. Olson is a constitutional scholar of the highest order. He has studied and written about the Federalist Papers, the Framers, and the Constitution. He earnestly believes in the Constitution's design of limited and separated powers. He sincerely and deeply believes that the States cannot deny any person equal protection of the laws. He understands that history and theory of our fundamental law. There is no doubt about that, in my opinion. And he has been involved with it all of his professional career—in Government and out of Government, including many successful years as a partner in one of the great law firms in the country: Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher.

Second, Mr. Olson's distinguished experience as a lawyer demonstrates his understanding that the Constitution has real and meaningful impact on the lives of ordinary Americans. He has applied constitutional theory as an Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Legal Counsel. That is a critical position in the Department of Justice that provides legal counsel in the Department of Justice and to all governmental agencies, usually including the President of the United States. He held that office in previous years. He has done this in his own practice when advocating before the courts, including the Supreme Court of the United States.

In Aetna Life Insurance Company v. Lavoie, he advocated the due process rights of litigants who faced a judge who had a conflict of interest in the case but would not recuse himself. He represented those litigants to ensure that they would get a fair judge. In Rice v. Cayetano, he advocated the voting rights of those excluded because of their race. And in Morrison v. Olson, he advocated the position that the separation of powers principle required prosecutors to be appointed by the executive branch, a position that this entire Congress has now come to embrace many years later. That was a courageous position he took. Ultimately, Mr. Olson won because his position was validated by subsequent events.

Mr. Olson had a legal career which has, to a remarkable degree, placed him as a key player in many of the important legal battles of our time. It is remarkable, really. These cases, many intense, have enriched him. They have enhanced his judgment and wisdom. I can think of no one better prepared to help the President of the United States and the Attorney General deal with complex, contentious, and important cases that are surely to come as the years go by.

When he was before the Judiciary Committee, I asked him: "Mr. Olson, are you prepared to tell the President of the United States no?"

Presidents get treated grandly, like corporate executives and Governors, and they want to do things, and they do not want a lawyer telling them they cannot do it. But sometimes there has to be a lawyer capable of telling the President "no." "No, sir, you cannot do that. The law will not allow that. I am sorry, Mr. President, we will try to figure out some other way for you to do what you want to do; you cannot do that."

I believe, based on Ted Olson's experience, his closeness to the President, the confidence the President has in him, he will be able to do that better than any person in America.

Finally, Mr. Olson is a man of unquestioned integrity. For example, when asked on numerous occasions to criticize the justices of the Florida Supreme Court in Bush v. Gore litigation, he always declined. He always respected the justices and their court, and even if he disagreed with their legal opinion—and his position was later validated by the U.S. Supreme Court. Mr. Olson's conduct in the most famous case of this generation, as well as his reputation, won him the endorsement of his adversary, Professor Laurence Tribe the famed and brilliant advocate for Al Gore.

Indeed, a President assembles an administration, and he is entitled to have around him people in whom he has great confidence, people whom, in the most critical points of his administration, he trusts to give him advice on which he can rely and make decisions.

What greater validation is there than perhaps the greatest lawsuit of this century for the Presidency of the United States, to be decided by the Court, and whom did President Bush, out of all the lawyers in America, choose? Did he want someone who was purely a political hack, someone who was a political guru, or did he want the best lawyer he could get to help him win the most important case facing the country maybe of the century? Whom did he choose? Isn't that a good reflection on Ted Olson's reputation that the President chose him, and it is not surprising that Al Gore chose someone of the quality of Laurence Tribe, two great, brilliant litigators in the Supreme Court that day.

Mr. Olson has written and he has thought deeply about constitutional law. He is not a professor, however, as many of our Solicitors General have been. He has been a lawyer involved in Government in all kinds of issues. During that time, he has gained extraordinary insight, skill, and knowledge about how Government works. He has incredibly unique and valuable qualities to bring to this office.

There is simply no better lawyer and no better person to fulfill the awesome responsibilities of the Solicitor General of the United States than Ted Olson. It is my privilege to support him and advocate his nomination.

I know there are a number of questions people will raise and have raised, but I believe, as Senator SPECTER pointed out in our hearings, we have to see where the beef is, what is the substance of the complaints against him.

One of the issues that came up was that he minimized his involvement in the "Arkansas Project" and that he did not tell the truth before the committee. I have the transcript of the testimony he gave.

This is what happened at the committee. He was sitting right there in the room testifying before us. Senator LEAHY went right to the heart of the matter, as he had every right to do. This was his question: "Were you involved in the so-called Arkansas Project at any time?"

The answer:

Mr. Olson: As a member of the board of directors of the American Spectator, I became aware of that. It has been alleged that I was somehow involved in that so-called project. I was not involved in the project in its origin or its management.

No one found fault with that. That statement has not been disputed to this day. There is certainly no evidence to say otherwise.

He stated:

I was not involved in the project in its origin or its management. As I understand it, what that was was a contribution by a foundation to the Spectator to conduct investigative journalism. I was on the board of the American Spectator later on when the allegation about the project was simply that it did exist. The publisher at that time, under the supervision of the board of directors, hired a major independent accounting firm to conduct an audit to report to the publisher and, therefore, to the board of directors with respect to how that money was funded. I was on the board at that time.

Mr. Olson was on the board when they conducted an investigation that the board decided to do.

Mr. Olson continued his answer in Committee:

As a result of that investigation, the magazine, while it felt it had the right to conduct these kinds of investigations, decided that it was not in the best interest of the magazine to do so. It ended the project. It established rules to restrict that kind of activity in the future.

Senator LEAHY interrupted him there. If he did not say enough, Senator LEAHY had every opportunity to ask him more questions. He was still talking about it when Senator LEAHY interrupted him and stopped him. The transcript shows:

... to restrict activities of the kind in the future and put it—

Senator LEAHY:

And Senator LEAHY asked some other questions about the same matter which Mr. Olson answered and that I do not think have been credibly disputed either. I submit that the man told the truth absolutely, indisputably.

I really believe, as Senator SPECTER said in Committee, we ought to be responsible around here. We ought to be careful about alleging that a nominee for a position such as Solicitor General of the United States is not being honest or is somehow being dishonest about what he says. I do not believe there are any facts to show that. That is why I care about how we proceed, and I am glad an agreement was reached that the matter could come forward.

On the question of Mr. Olson's integrity, we have a number of people who vouch for him. Let's look at these Democrats.

Laurence Tribe, the professor who litigated against him in Bush v. Gore, said:

It surely cannot be that anyone who took the prevailing view [in Bush v. Gore] and fought for it must on that account be opposed for the position of Solicitor General. Because Ted Olson briefed and argued his side of the case with intelligence, with insight, and with integrity, his advocacy on the occasion of the Florida election litigation—profoundly as I disagree with him on the merits—counts for me as a "plus" in this context, not a minus. If we set Bush v. Gore aside, what remains in Ted's case is an undeniably distinguished career of an obviously exceptional lawyer with an enormous breadth of directly relevant experience.

I certainly agree with that. That is from Al Gore's lawyer.

Walter Dellinger, former Solicitor General under President Clinton, said when Ted Olson was at the Office of Legal Counsel he "was viewed as someone who brought considerable integrity to the decision-making."

Beth Nolan, former Clinton White House counsel and Reagan Department of Justice Office of Legal Counsel attorney in a letter said:

[W]e all hold Mr. Olson in a very high professional and personal regard, because we believe that he made his decisions with integrity, after long and hard reflection. We cannot recall a single instance in which Mr. Olson compromised his integrity to serve the expedients of the [Reagan] administration.

Floyd Abrams, esteemed first amendment lawyer, stated in March 2001:

I've known Ted since we worked together on a Supreme Court case—Metromedia v. San Diego—20 years ago and . . . I've always been impressed with his talent, his personal decency and his honor. He would serve with distinction as Solicitor General.

Harold Koh, former Clinton Administration Assistant Secretary of State in February of this year:

Ted Olson is a lawyer of extremely high professional integrity. In all of my dealings with him, I have seen him display high moral character and a very deep commitment to upholding the rule of law.

Robert Bennett, attorney for former President Bill Clinton during a lot of this litigation and impeachment matters also supports Mr. Olson's nomination. He is a well-known defense lawyer and certainly very close to President Clinton. He came to the markup when we voted on this in committee and sat throughout the markup. This is what he wrote to the Committee:

While I do not have any personal knowledge as to what role, if any, Mr. Olson played in the "Arkansas Project" or the full extent of his relationship with the American Spectator, what I do know is that Ted Olson is a truth-teller and you can rely on his representations regarding these matters. . . . He is a man of great personal integrity and credibility and should be confirmed.

So, then-Governor Bush chose a man to represent him in the biggest case in his life. He chose a man who had a reputation of this kind among opposing lawyers, lawyers who do not agree with him politically. That is what they say about him.

He is uniquely qualified for the job, and he has the unique confidence of the President of the United States. This is what we ought to do: We ought to give the President whomever he wants in his administration if we can justify doing so. If there is some serious problem, we have a right to inquire into that. That has been inquired into and no legitimate basis has been developed on which to oppose the nomination.

Then the question is: "Should a nominee be confirmed?" And the presumption is that he should unless there is a problem.

There were a number of "charges" suggested. I will mention briefly that Mr. Olson wrote articles for the American Spectator and received some pay for some of them. He admitted that before the hearings. When he was asked to produce what he published, he submitted those articles to the Committee. Everybody knew that. After the hearing, Senator KENNEDY said he was going to vote for him. He was satisfied. There was no dispute about his involvement with the magazine.

His opponents said Mr. Olson played word games. Mr. Olson clearly responded that he wasn't involved in the management or the origin of this so-called Arkansas Project, but that when he was at dinners and he talked about the public Clinton scandals over dinner. Anybody knows if you are at a luncheon and you are talking, or at a dinner with an editor and he is writing political articles of this kind, you are going to talk about it. But it doesn't mean he originated the project or managed the project in any way, and that is what he said, "I did not do."

With respect to Mr. Olson's representation of David Hale, he plainly said that he was not compensated for that work. He said he had helped Hale from the beginning, but that he was never paid for it—he never got paid for representing him. He never denied representing David Hale, being asked by another lawyer, I believe he said, to help him. This was supported by the Independent Counsel Ray who has stated that the Shaheen Report on whether Mr. Hale was paid to testify found no evidence of any improprieties here.

With respect to an American Spectator article on Vince Foster's death, Mr. Olson did not write it. He told the magazine employees that he didn't put much stock in it, but it was all right for the magazine to publish it. The First Amendment generally protects the press when it publishes articles on public figures. It is a free country. I do not believe that the magazine was sued over it. Mr. Olson didn't put much stock in it, but if the magazine wanted to publish it, fine. That is what I understood his statement to be. That is very different from the nominee writing the article or submitting it in a brief to a court.

There were questions raised about a chart that he prepared that showed the federal and state criminal offenses that the Clintons could have violated if public allegations were proven in a court of law. He gave the chart to the Committee before we even had the hearing. That was something he had written and produced. We all knew about that.

I would just say this. A man's professional skill, his integrity, is determined and built up over a period of years. We in this body, as Senators, know we can make a speech here and we can misspeak, and we have one of our staff, if they have a little time, go back and read it and correct the record.

A nominee cannot do that. What Ted Olson said, he said under oath. I don't see he made a mistake at all. We never apologize around here. We make mistakes. We misstate facts. I have done it. I try not to. As a former prosecutor, I always try not to misstate the facts. I work at it very hard. I still find when I leave the floor sometimes I have misspoken. But are you going to call a press conference and try to apologize? We just do it and get away with it. This man told the truth. I don't see where he told anything that was a lie.

I know there are some activists who do not want to see the man who handled the Bush v. Gore case confirmed. They don't want to see confirmed a man who gave legal advice to the American Spectator, who thought there was something rotten in Arkansas and went out and investigated it. How many of them went to jail over it? Some of them are still in the bastille, perhaps for crimes they committed that this magazine investigated. What is wrong with that? Isn't this America? I don't see anything wrong with Mr. Scaife giving money, legally, to investigate a stinking mess. That is what we had in Arkansas.

The Independent Counsel investigations and the impeachment were tough times for this country. Those matters are behind us. We are at a point now where we have a new administration that is building its team. It is time that the President be able to have his top constitutional adviser on board, be able to do his duty.

I am glad we can have this debate. Some see this nomination differently. I respect their views. Ultimately, however, there is no dispute based on facts in the record. I am glad this nomination is being moved forward and that we can have an up-or-down vote on it.

I believe Mr. Olson will be confirmed. I think he should be. I am honored to cast my vote for him. I urge others to do so likewise.

Mr. President, I yield the floor and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SESSIONS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SESSIONS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that any time used in the quorum call subsequent to this be charged against both sides equally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SESSIONS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I congratulate Senator HATCH and Senator LEAHY for bringing the nomination of Ted Olson to be Solicitor General to the floor of the Senate. I am delighted we are going to have a vote on Mr. Olson. I know him well. I think he will be an outstanding Solicitor General not only for this President and this administration but for our country as well.

Mr. Olson's qualifications are beyond reproach. He was an undergraduate at the University of the Pacific and received his law degree from the University of California at Berkeley. He has been a partner at Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, one of the nation's leading law firms, from 1965 to 1981, and also from 1984 until the present time. He served as Assistant Attorney General from 1981 to 1984, providing legal advice to President Reagan and Attorney General William French Smith and other executive branch officials.

He has handled a lot of very important cases. Probably the best known case was Bush v. Gore. No matter which side of that case you supported, you had to admire the skill with which he argued a very complicated and, needless to say, very important case. In addition, he has argued numerous other very significant cases before the Supreme Court and other federal and state courts. I will include for the RECORD a highlight of seven of these important cases.

Ted Olson has been on both sides of the courtroom battles. He has defended the Government and counseled the President. As Assistant Attorney General, he dealt with limiting government power as well. In private practice, he has defended private interests against the Government. In his arguments on both sides of the courtroom, he has presented factual cases and positions in both Federal and state courts, arguing for the government and against the Government. That type of experience is almost unequaled in a nominee for Solicitor General.

He will be an outstanding credit to the administration and to the country. His nomination is supported by liberals and conservatives, by individuals such as Robert Bork, Robert Bennett and Laurence Tribe. Different people with different viewpoints have reached the same conclusion I have reached: Ted Olson will be an outstanding Solicitor General, and he should receive our very strong support. I am delighted we will be confirming him as the next Solicitor General of the United States.

I ask unanimous consent to print the list of cases to which I referred in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEADING CASES TED OLSON ARGUED

Ted Olson has argued or been the counsel of record in some of the leading cases before the Supreme Court:

Rice v. Cayetano (2000)—Counsel of record for the prevailing party in this case in which the Court struck down as a violation of the Fifteenth Amendment. Hawaiian legislation restricting voting in certain elections to citizens based on racial classifications.

U.S. v. Mr. Olson was counsel of record for the Commonwealth of Virginia and Virginia Military Institute.

Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority (1985)—Whether the Tenth Amendment's reservation of powers to the states precluded application of the minimum wage and other employment standards of the Federal Fair Labor Standards Act to wages paid by the City of San Antonio to municipal transit workers. Mr. Olson was counsel of record for the United States.

Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Mr. Olson was counsel on the briefs for the United States.

OTHER LEADING CASES

I also ask unanimous consent that following the vote on the confirmation of the Olson nomination, the Senate then proceed to two additional votes, the first vote on the confirmation of Calendar No. 83, Viet Dinh, to be followed by a vote on the confirmation of Calendar No. 84, Michael Chertoff. Finally, I ask consent that following those votes, the President be immediately notified of the Senate's action, and the Senate then resume legislative session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HATCH. For the information of all Senators, under this agreement, there will be three consecutive rollcall votes on these nominations.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the Olson nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

NOMINATION OF THEODORE BEVRY OLSON, OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, TO BE SOLICITOR GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the clerk will report the nomination.

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of Theodore Bevry Olson, of the District of Columbia, to be Solicitor General of the United States.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I rise today in support of the nomination of a Virginian, Theodore "Ted" Olson, to serve as the Solicitor General of the United States.

Article II, Section 2 of the Constitution provides that the President:

shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint . . . Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States. . . .

Thus, the Constitution provides a role for both the President and the Senate in this process. The President has the power to nominate, and the Senate has the power to render advice and consent on the nomination.

In fulfilling the constitutional role of the Senate, I have, throughout my career, tried to give fair and objective consideration to both Republican and Democratic Presidential nominees at all levels.

It has always been my policy to review nominees to ensure that the nominee has the qualifications necessary to perform the job, to ensure that the nominee will enforce the laws of the land, and to ensure that the nominee possesses the level of integrity, character, and honesty that the American people deserve and expect from public office holders.

Having considered these factors, I have come to the conclusion that Ted Olson is fully qualified to serve as our great Nation's next Solicitor General.

The Solicitor General's Office supervises and conducts all Government litigation in the U.S. Supreme Court. The Solicitor General helps develop the Government's positions on cases and personally argues many of the most significant cases before the Supreme Court.

Given these great responsibilities, it is no surprise that the Solicitor General is the only officer of the United States required by statute to be "learned in the law."

Mr. Olson's background in the law is impressive. He received his law degree in 1965 from the University of California at Berkeley where he was a member of the California Law Review and graduated Order of the Coif.

Upon graduation, Mr. Olson joined the firm of Gibson, Dunn, & Crutcher in 1965, becoming a partner in 1972. During this time, Mr. Olson had a general trial and appellate practice as well as a constitutional law practice.

In 1981, Mr. Olson was appointed by President Reagan to serve as Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel in the U.S. Department of Justice. During his 4 years in this position, Mr. Olson provided counsel to the President, Attorney General, and heads of the executive branch departments.

After serving in the Reagan administration, Mr. Olson returned to private practice. He has argued numerous cases before the Supreme Court, including one that we are all familiar with related to this past election and the Florida election results. His vast experience in litigating before the Supreme Court will serve him well as Solicitor General.

Based on this extensive experience in the law, it goes without saying that Mr. Olson is "learned in the law." Mr. Olson is obviously extremely well-qualified to serve as our next Solicitor General.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am very pleased to support Mr. Ted Olson today to be Solicitor General.

Mr. Olson is one of the most qualified people ever nominated for this position. He has had an extensive and impressive legal career, specializing in appellate law. He has argued many cases of great significance in the Federal courts, including 15 cases before the U.S. Supreme Court. He also has written extensively and testified before the Congress on a wide variety of legal issues.

In addition, he served admirably as Assistant Attorney General in the Office of Legal Counsel under President Reagan. He provided expert, non-partisan advice based on the law. I am confident he will do the same as Solicitor General. For example, he has assured the Judiciary Committee that he will defend laws of Congress as long as there is any reasonable argument to support them.

Over the years, he has earned a distinguished reputation in the legal community. In fact, he has been endorsed for this position by a wide variety of people in the profession, including Harvard Law Professor Laurence Tribe.

Mr. Olson is a decent, honorable man, and a person of high character and integrity. He is one of the most capable and distinguished attorneys practicing law today.

Many allegations have been raised about Mr. Olson, but there is no merit to these charges. The fact that allegations are raised does not mean they are true or that they have any significance. Based on reservations raised by Democrats, the Judiciary Committee has closely reviewed these matters. Throughout the process, Mr. Olson has been very cooperative and straightforward with the committee. It is true that he wrote in the American Spectator about the scandals of the Clinton administration, and spoke with people involved with the magazine about these matters. After all, the Clintons were a major focus of the magazine, and there were many scandals to report about. This does not mean that Mr. Olson misled the committee about his knowledge of the Arkansas Project or anything else. There is nothing to show that he has done anything wrong, and there is no reason to keep searching.

The Washington Post, which is the primary newspaper in which the allegations were raised and is not known for conservative editorials, concluded that Mr. Olson should be confirmed. It stated that "there's no evidence that his testimony was inaccurate in any significant way."

As chairman of the Constitution Subcommittee, I know that the Justice Department needs the Solicitor General to be confirmed as soon as possible. The representative for the United States to the Supreme Court is an extremely important position that has been vacant for months. For the sake of justice, it is critical that the Senate acts on this nomination.

I urge my colleagues to support Mr. Olson today. He deserves our support. I recognize that members have the right to vote against a nominee for any reason. But, if they do, I firmly believe they will be voting against one of the finest and most able men we have ever considered for Solicitor General.

Mr. FEINGOLD. Mr. President, I have so far voted for all of President Bush's nominees for positions in the Department of Justice and other executive branch departments. As I have explained before, I believe that the President's choices for executive positions are due great deference by the Senate. I am very reluctant to vote against a qualified nominee for such a position. I have been criticized for some of my votes on this President's nominations, including my vote for Attorney General Ashcroft, and I'm sure I will take criticism for some of my votes in the future.

But, I have never said I will vote for every executive branch nominee, and today I must vote "No" on the nomination of Theodore Olson to be Solicitor General of the United States.

I am disappointed that the Senate is moving so quickly to a vote on this nomination. I believe that serious questions exist about Mr. Olson's candor in his testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee. Although there has been some further inquiry about these matters in the past week, after the Judiciary Committee voted 9-9 on Mr. Olson's nomination, the Senate has not had time to review and digest even the limited additional information that the inquiry uncovered. Without further time to resolve the questions that our committee's work has raised, I cannot in good conscience vote for Mr. Olson.

Simply put, I am concerned that Mr. Olson was not adequately forthcoming in his testimony before the Judiciary Committee particularly on the issue of his involvement with the so-called "Arkansas Project," which was an effort to unearth scandals involving former President Clinton and his wife, undertaken by the American Spectator magazine with funding from Richard Mellon Scaife. Let me emphasize that I am not alleging that Mr. Olson committed perjury or told an out and out lie. But it seems to me that Mr. Olson was attempting to minimize his participation in the Arkansas Project and portray it in the least objectionable light to those of us on the Democratic side, rather than simply answering the questions forthrightly and completely. As the dispute developed, Mr. Olson's supporters have gone to great lengths to argue that he answered truthfully when he said: "I was not involved in the project in its origin or its management." But Senator LEAHY did not ask if he was involved in the origin or management of the Arkansas Project. He asked: "Were you involved in the so-called Arkansas Project at any time." Mr. Olson was not adequately forthcoming in his answer to that question.

The Solicitor General of the United States is an extremely important position in our government. It is not only the third ranking official in the Justice Department, it is the representative of the executive branch before the Supreme Court of the United States. I want the person in that position to be not just technically accurate and truthful in answering the questions of the Justices, but to be forthcoming. I want the Solicitor General to answer the Justices' questions not as a hostile witness would, narrowly responding only to the question asked and revealing as little information as possible, but as a trusted colleague would, trying to give as much relevant information as possible in response not only to the question as framed, but to the substance of the question that the Justice might have been asking, but might not have precisely articulated.

That is also how I want nominees before Senate committees to answer questions. Our questions at nominations hearings are not a game of "gotcha." We are not trying to trap nominees. We are attempting to elicit information that is relevant to our decision as to whether a nominee should serve in the office to which he or she has been nominated. We deserve forthcoming and complete answers, not just technically truthful answers. We shouldn't have to frame our questions so precisely as to preclude an evasive or disingenuous answer. We are not in a court of law. We don't ask leading questions of nominees in order to pin them down to "yes" or "no" answers. We want and expect nominees to give us complete and open answers, to put on the record all the information they have at their disposal that will help us exercise our constitutional duty to advise and consent.

Many Senators were concerned about Mr. Olson's highly partisan writings about the previous Administration, and particularly about the Department of Justice under the previous Attorney General. They were concerned about Mr. Olson's association with an organized and well-funded attempt to dig up dirt on the President of the United States. They asked questions to find out what Mr. Olson did, and what he knew. It was not just a question of whether Mr. Olson did something illegal or improper. Each Senator was and is entitled to make his or her own judgment about whether Mr. Olson's involvement with the Arkansas Project, whatever it was, is relevant to his fitness to serve as Solicitor General. We were entitled to complete and forthcoming answers to the questions that were asked. We did not get them.

Mr. Olson's failure to be forthcoming in his testimony has led me to have concern about his ability to serve as Solicitor General, especially given the special duties of that office. I would not vote against him simply because of his conservative views and record. I am concerned about his fitness to be Solicitor General.

Mr. Olson testified that the Solicitor General owes the Supreme Court "absolute candor and fair dealing." I think that nominees owe Senate committees that same duty when they testify at nominations hearings. I do not think that Mr. Olson met that standard and I don't think the process surrounding this nomination has allowed Senators adequately to consider this important exercise of their duty to advise and consent. I therefore, with regret, must oppose his nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Theodore Bevery Olson, of the District of Columbia, to be Solicitor General of the United States? On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

The nomination was confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the next votes begin, which will be momentarily, they be 10-minute rollcalls.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, as I stated at the beginning of this debate, of course I respect the will of the Senate and the vote of every Senator.

I hope now that Mr. Olson has been confirmed as Solicitor General, he will listen very carefully to the debate and handle that position with the non-partisanship and candor the office requires. I congratulate him on his confirmation and wish him and his family well.

I yield the floor.

NOMINATION OF VIET D. DINH TO BE AN ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the clerk will report the nomination.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Viet D. Dinh of the District of Columbia to be an Assistant Attorney General.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I strongly support the nominations of Michael Chertoff to be Assistant Attorney General for the Criminal Division and Viet Dinh to be Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Policy Development.

Both nominees have outstanding qualifications. Mr. Chertoff graduated with honors from both Harvard College and Harvard Law School, then served as a law clerk for Justice Brennan of the U.S. Supreme Court. He also served as an Assistant U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York, and as the U.S. Attorney for the District of New Jersey. In 1994, Mr. Chertoff served as Special Counsel for the U.S. Senate Special Committee to Investigate Whitewater and Related Matters. Most recently he has worked as a partner at the prestigious law firm of Latham & Watkins, where he is national chair of the firm's white collar criminal practice. He was also appointed Special Counsel by the New Jersey Senate Judiciary Committee in its inquiry into racial profiling by state police. As his distinguished career illustrates, Mr. Chertoff is well suited to lead the Department of Justice Criminal Division—which explains why his nomination has received significant bipartisan support.

Viet Dinh is likewise eminently qualified for the position of Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Policy Development. As Mr. Dinh told us during his confirmation hearing, he came to this country from Vietnam when he was ten years old under extraordinarily difficult circumstances. He went on to graduate from Harvard College and then Harvard Law School with honors. Mr. Dinh completed two federal clerkships, one for Judge Laurence Silberman on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, and the other for Justice Sandra Day O'Connor on the Supreme Court. He then served as Associate Special Counsel to the Senate Special Committee to Investigate Whitewater. In 1996, he became a professor at Georgetown University Law Center, where he received tenure last year. His academic writings evince a sharp legal mind and keen judgment—attributes that are essential to lead the Office of Policy Development.

Both Mr. Dinh and Mr. Chertoff have distinguished themselves with hard work and great intellect. I am confident that they will do great service to the Department of Justice and the citizens of this country, and I support their nominations wholeheartedly.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I rise today in support of Viet Dinh, the President's nominee to be Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Policy Development. I have had the pleasure of knowing him both professionally and personally over the past several years and cannot imagine a more qualified candidate for this position.

Professor Dinh's journey began 23 years ago on a small fishing boat off the coast of Vietnam. For 12 days, the ten-year-old Viet and 84 others fought storms, hunger, and gunfire as their boat drifted in the South China Sea. Fortunately, Viet, his mother, and six siblings, reached a refugee camp after coming ashore in Malaysia. After being admitted to the United States Viet's family arrived in Oregon and later moved to California, where Viet became a U.S. citizen.

Those early years presented many challenges for Viet and his family. They had little money and worked long hours in the berry fields. Moreover, Viet's father had been incarcerated in Vietnam because of his role as a city councilman. It was not until 1983 that they were finally reunited after his father's successful escape from Vietnam.

Despite this tumultuous beginning, Dinh persevered. More than that, he excelled. Perhaps those early obstacles hardened Viet's resolve and fueled his rapid ascent through the legal profession.

Viet graduated magna cum laude from both Harvard College and Harvard Law School, where he was a class marshal and an Olin Research Fellow in law and economics. He served as a law clerk to Judge Laurence H. Silberman of the U.S. Court Appeals for the D.C. Circuit and to U.S. Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

Shortly after Viet completed his Supreme Court clerkship, he came to work for the U.S. Senate, where I had the opportunity to work with him for the first time. He quickly demonstrated his outstanding legal ability, superb professional judgment, and fine character.

Professor Dinh's record of achievement continued in academia. Viet currently is a professor of law at Georgetown University, where he is the deputy director of the Asian Law and Policy Studies Program. In addition to his expertise in Asian law, Professor Dinh is accomplished in constitutional law, corporate law, and international law. He has also served as counsel to the special master mediating lawsuits by Holocaust victims against German and Austrian banks.

Since he left the Senate, I have called on him from time to time for counsel on constitutional issues. On each occasion, Viet exhibited a comprehensive knowledge of the law and extraordinary energy.

In closing, I believe that Professor Dinh's character, along with his distinguished academic and professional accomplishments, make him uniquely qualified to serve in the Department of Justice. It is, thus, with great pleasure that I will vote for his confirmation.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I am prepared to vote in favor of Professor Dinh's nomination to be the Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Policy Development at the Department of Justice. I do so, however, with reservations.

Like other members of the committee, I admire Professor Dinh and his family for the courage they displayed during their extraordinary journey to this country from Vietnam. I also do not question Professor's Dinh's obvious intelligence or his academic achievements. If we were evaluating a nominee for a teaching position, I would vote for him without hesitation.

However, I am concerned by Professor Dinh's relative lack of experience for the position in the Department of Justice for which he has been nominated. One of the major responsibilities of the Office of Policy Development at the Department of Justice, which Professor Dinh has been nominated to head, is the evaluation of the qualifications and fitness of candidates for the Federal judiciary. Yet Professor Dinh, as he concedes, has never appeared as an attorney in a court of law. Aside from being a law clerk and an academic, Professor Dinh's principal real-world experience since graduating from law school in 1993 has been as associate counsel to the Republicans in the Senate Whitewater investigation of President Clinton. While that was no doubt an excellent introduction to the world of partisan politics, it hardly provides a model of the apolitical and unbiased pursuit of justice that ought to characterize the operations of the United States Department of Justice.

I am also concerned by Professor Dinh's testimony about his involvement with the Federalist Society. In answer to questions by Senator DURBIN, Professor Dinh testified that he did not know whether the Federalist Society had a stated philosophy and that he viewed it simply as "a forum for discussion of law and public policy from both sides." (Tr. 71, 73). Yet the Federalist Society itself states quite prominently on its internet website that it is "a group of conservatives and libertarians interested in the current state of the legal order" and concerned with the alleged domination of the legal profession "by a form of orthodox liberal ideology which advocates a centralized and uniform society." I do not, of course, suggest that membership in the Federalist Society should disqualify someone from public office, any more than should membership in other organizations such as the American Civil Liberties Union that seek to promote a particular political philosophy or agenda. Nevertheless, it is simply not accurate to portray the Federalist Society as a non-partisan debating society.

In his writings, Professor Dinh, like other members of the Federalist Society, has condemned what is sometimes called "judicial activism." However, when I asked Professor Dinh in my written questions to cite some specific cases where courts that had occurred, the only example he provided was a California decision from 1854 that dealt with the disqualification of persons of Chinese ancestry from testifying in court. While obviously no one would disagree with Professor Dinh's condemnation of that odious decision, his answer is not particularly enlightening as to what he views as the proper limits on the role of the judiciary in the 21st century. Many legal scholars regard the Supreme Court's decision in Bush v. Gore as a recent and obvious example of a court's overstepping its role and improperly injecting itself into the political arena. Yet, when I asked Professor Dinh specifically about that case in my written questions, he stated that, in his opinion, the Supreme Court Justices had "exercised their judgment in a thoughtful and prudent manner given the nature of the case, the rulings below and the constraints of time."

Despite my misgivings, I have decided to vote in favor of Professor Dinh's nomination. I believe that he has answered the Committee's questions. I am giving him the benefit of all doubts and giving deference to the President's decision with respect to this appointed policy position. Moreover, regardless of Professor Dinh's political views and associations, I credit his assurances that he will exercise his judgment based upon the merits of legal positions and judicial candidates he is called upon to evaluate rather than on political ideology.

NOMINATION OF MICHAEL CHERTOFF TO BE AN ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the clerk will report the nomination.

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of Michael Chertoff, of New Jersey, to be an Assistant Attorney General.

Mr. CORZINE. Mr. President, I am pleased to support the nomination of Michael Chertoff to be Assistant Attorney General for the Criminal Division. Mr. Chertoff has ably served the citizens of New Jersey in numerous capacities, as well as the Department of Justice and indeed the Nation. We will all be fortunate to have his tremendous skills at the helm of the Criminal Division.

Mr. Chertoff has impeccable credentials, not the least of which is being a native New Jerseyan. He attended Harvard College, then Harvard Law School, where he was Editor of the Harvard Law Review. He then served as a Supreme Court law clerk. In both private practice and public service since then he has developed a reputation as a brilliant, tough, fair, and truly world class litigator, and earned the respect of his peers and adversaries. Indeed, one New Jersey paper has even suggested he might be New Jersey's "Lawyer Laureate." While I should acknowledge that we might not agree on every issue, I consider Mr. Chertoff to be one of the finest lawyers my State has to offer.

From 1990 to 1994, Mr. Chertoff served New Jersey exceptionally well as our U.S. Attorney, where he tackled organized crime, public corruption, health care fraud and bank fraud. Unlike his predecessors, as U.S. Attorney he continued to try cases himself, and his long hours and unending commitment to the job and the citizens of New Jersey were legendary. He tackled the highest-profile cases in a serious and thoughtful manner, and, despite being one of the youngest U.S. Attorneys in the Nation, raised the profile and reputation for excellence of the U.S. Attorney's Office in Newark.

More recently, Mr. Chertoff has played a critical role in helping the New Jersey State legislature investigate racial profiling. As Special Counsel to the State Senate Judiciary Committee, he helped the committee probe how top state officials handled racial profiling by the State Police. His work was bipartisan and thoroughly professional, and helped expose the fact that for too long, state authorities were aware that statistics showed minority motorists were being treated unfairly by some law enforcement officials, and yet ignored the problem.

Mr. Chertoff is one of our Nation's most competent and respected lawyers, with a very distinguished record of public and private service. I urge my colleagues to join me in support of his nomination.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I am voting in favor of Mr. Chertoff's nomination to be the Assistant Attorney General for the Criminal Division at the Department of Justice.

I have been concerned that Mr. Chertoff, like several of the President's other nominees for top positions in the Department of Justice, has a history of partisan political activities. Mr. Chertoff was special counsel to the Republicans in the Senate Whitewater investigation of President Clinton, which hardly provided a model for the apolitical and unbiased search for justice that ought to characterize the operations of the United States Department of Justice.

Fortunately, however, Mr. Chertoff also has an established track record as a Federal prosecutor apart from his involvement with the Whitewater Committee. More importantly, he has answered the committee's questions about his political activities and has given appropriate assurances that he will not allow partisanship to influence the exercise of his judgment on the legal merits of questions he will address as the Assistant Attorney General for the Criminal Division. I credit his assurances, and for that reason I am voting for his nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Michael Chertoff, of New Jersey, to be an Assistant Attorney General? On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

A CHANGE IN THE SENATE

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I rise for a couple of minutes to briefly discuss the change that occurred today in the Senate and to share some thoughts, if I may.

First, I think I can safely speak for virtually all of us in this Chamber on both sides of the aisle in expressing our affection for our colleague from Vermont. He has been a friend to us for many years. He is known in this body as a good and decent man. I have no doubt that the high esteem in which he has been held will continue.

Secondly, I think it bears mentioning that despite the change in the caucus ratio that will soon occur, the Senate is going about its business today much as it did yesterday and much as I am confident it will in the days to come. That is how this institution functions, and whether ratios change by 1 or 2 in one direction or the other is certainly big political news for some, I guess. My guess is that the substantive work will continue much as it has, with us having to work out differences and compromise to benefit the public at large.

This conduct of business according to established and familiar routines is a good sign that the Senate will to a large degree continue to operate on a bipartisan basis to accomplish the work the American public sent us here to do.

This change will, without a doubt, have an impact on committee ratios, on the subject of hearings and witnesses, and on the substance of legislation we will consider, to some degree. However, just as important, it should—and I believe will—cement the need for bipartisanship in how we conduct our business and in how we govern together with the administration and the other body.

We in the Democratic Caucus now share a new responsibility with our Republican friends for addressing and advancing, as equal partners, the interests of the larger American public. I know of nobody in our caucus who shrinks from or shirks that responsibility. Indeed, I think we all welcome it.

Likewise for our Republican friends, bipartisanship will now become as much a necessity for them as it has been for us Democrats.

Perhaps most importantly, it will not be enough any longer to embrace bipartisanship in word; we will from now on have to demonstrate it in deeds as well. I look forward to beginning this new chapter in the Senate's history with all of our colleagues.

On that score, allow me to say that I hope one of the first orders of business we will take up after reorganizing will be election reform. I realize we have many important matters to consider regarding education, a Patients' Bill of Rights, prescription drugs, energy, the environment, environmental protection, minimum wage, and foreign and defense policies. The list is rather long and tremendously worthwhile.

But I submit to our colleagues that election reform is also an issue that deserves our early consideration in the Senate. It is an issue of fundamental importance for the simple reason that it concerns the most fundamental of American rights, the right to vote. I know a number of our colleagues on both sides of the aisle have given various opinions on this matter, and even drafted legislation. These include my colleague from Arizona, Senator MCCAIN, Senator HOLLINGS, Senator MCCONNELL of Kentucky, Senator SCHUMER, Senator BROWNBACK, Senator TORRICELLI, and others.

There are a lot of ideas kicking around on how we might improve the electoral process in this country. The list reflects a widespread and bipartisan recognition that the events of last November—not just in Florida and not just last November, but ones that have been ongoing for a number of years—illustrate that our electoral system is in need of repair and reform. With only one-half of all the eligible voters in this country participating in a Presidential election and one-quarter of those eligible voters choosing the President of the United States, then I think all of us recognize that, if we do nothing else, there is need for reform that would make this process more inclusive, to reach out to every American who is not participating in this process.

I hope we will act in that recognition in the weeks to come, and I hope we will pass legislation which ensures that many of the mistakes and wrongs, if you will, in the electoral process will forever be events of the past, never to be repeated.

Congressman JOHN CONYERS of Michigan and I have introduced legislation that will establish some minimum national requirements to ensure that voters, on Presidential races and races involving the National Legislature, regardless of race, disability, or language minority, will not be turned away from the polls in the next Presidential election. This legislation has well over 100 cosponsors in the House of Representatives, the other body, and 50 cosponsors in this Chamber.

This bill would establish three commonsense requirements:

First, that all voting machines and systems used in Federal elections, starting in the year 2004, conform to uniform, nondiscriminatory standards to ensure that no voter will be disenfranchised because of race; that blind and disabled voters can vote with independence and privacy; language minorities can read ballots and instructions in their native language; and all of us can vote with the assurance that our vote will not be canceled because of overvotes, undervotes, or outdated machinery.

Second, the bill requires that all States provide for provisional voting so that no voter who goes to the polls is told he or she cannot vote because their name is not on a registration list or their identification is not good enough.

Third, and lastly, the bill provides that all voters receive a copy or sample ballot with instructions on how to vote, including their rights as voters.

In this Senator's view, with any legislation that doesn't include these three national requirements is simply unacceptable.

Bills that only offer, on a voluntary basis, funding for States to take certain actions will not ensure that Americans—African Americans, Hispanic Americans, Asian Americans, the blind and disabled, and many others—working men and women across the country, can exercise their most precious right to vote and to have their vote counted.

Forty-seven years ago this month, the Supreme Court issued its landmark decision in the case of Brown v. Board of Education. On that May day, the Court did not rule that States could desegregate their classrooms. It ruled that they would do so "with all deliberate speed," in the now famous words of that decision.

Thirty-seven years ago, when we wrote the Civil Rights Act, the Congress did not say that restaurants, stores, hotels, and other public accommodations could desegregate their facilities. We decreed that they would do so, and do so without delay.

When, in 1965, we passed the Voting Rights Act, the Congress did not say States could, if they so chose, do away with barriers to voting such as poll taxes and literacy tests. We said they had to do away with it because the right to vote was far too precious and too vital to be in any way denied to any American citizen based on race or ethnicity.

Lastly, when in 1990 Bob Dole and President George Bush joined with George Mitchell, TED KENNEDY, and others to enact the Americans with Disabilities Act, we did not leave it to chance as to whether public facilities would be accessible to the disabled. We decided as a country that the time had come to remove those barriers to access.

At critical moments, whether it was to go to a restroom or a restaurant or to have access to a hotel or any other public accommodation, we said that people had the right to be there, and in the case of a voting booth, it certainly ought to hold no less a status than a restaurant, restroom, hotel, or any other public accommodation. People ought to have the right to be in that voting booth, to cast their vote and have it counted.

At critical moments in our history, such as those I just enumerated, our Nation has been resolved in advancing the cause of equality and freedom. We have not settled for voluntary measures when fundamental rights were at stake. I believe the same resolve is called for at this moment in our history when we know that so many Americans, perhaps millions, were denied the right to vote and the right to have their vote counted. With the same resolve demonstrated in times past, we can assure that will never happen again in America as it was so unjustly denied to many in the previous elections.

I urge my colleagues to take a look at the proposed legislation. When we return after the break, I invite any comments, thoughts, and ideas on how this bill can be improved, but I hope there will be strong bipartisan support for this effort. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama.

RETIREMENT OF NANCY BRIANI

Mr. SESSIONS. Mr. President, I rise today to recognize a member of my staff, Nancy Briani, who will be retiring from the Senate at the end of this month. She will be sorely missed by me and all who have had the opportunity to work with her.

Nancy began her career in the Senate 25 years ago when she joined the staff of Senator Jim Pearson of Kansas as a receptionist.

Following Senator Pearson's retirement in 1978, Nancy became office manager for his successor—Senator Nancy Landon Kassebaum. From the setting up of that freshman Senator's office to closing down operations and turning in the keys 18 years later, Nancy was there and remains a very close friend of Senator Kassebaum.

She has approached her job as office manager in a diligent and methodical fashion. She recognizes that well-organized support functions are a critical foundation in the hectic and fast-paced environment of a Senate office. Nancy has consistently brought to her work a quiet, but firm, determination to see that things are done properly. She stayed, as we were taught many years ago, until it was done right.

During her tenure in the Senate, Nancy helped guide her coworkers through the transition from 3-color carbon sets to the computer age, and she is a good manager of computers. It fell upon her to determine how to file the "yellows" in a post-carbon era and how to assure that documents were not "lost in space" due to haphazard filing and forgotten file names.

Her proofreading skills are not limited to catching typos. Rather, she brings to bear the full force of her early experience and training as a teacher. One of the most well thumbed cards in her Rolodex is that of the Grammarphone—a grammar hotline operated by Frostburg State University—to make sure our material goes out correctly. After all, a Senator ought to know how to punctuate correspondence.

Shortly after my election to the Senate in 1996, I had the good fortune of bringing Nancy onto my staff after Nancy Kassebaum retired. Her years of experience and her solid professionalism proved invaluable to me in putting together my office here in Washington.

Her effective management of the day-to-day operations of my office has made a real difference in my ability to serve the people of Alabama.

The work that Nancy has done in her 25 years of service in the Senate does not produce headlines in the newspaper or segments on TV talk shows. Indeed, this is the first time in her 25 years that she has come on to the floor of the Senate Chamber. Young staff members get to do that if they are working on legislation, but she has been doing her job managing the work product in our office.

In fact, the best mark of success for an office manager is that the smooth operation of an office is taken for granted. In that, Nancy has excelled.

The truth is that Nancy lives by the greatest American virtues. She is directly honest, she is exceedingly diligent in her work, always taking care to ensure that things are completed and done right. I have greatly admired her frugality, a trait that has fallen from favor but which is much needed today. She watches every penny of the taxpayers' money in a way I greatly admire.

In a host of ways, Nancy has lived by these great American values and has taught them to hundreds of young people who have worked with her as interns and young staffers over the years. Such richness of contribution simply cannot be replaced.

As Nancy leaves the Senate to start a new chapter in her life, she can take great pride and satisfaction in the accomplishments she has made and the respect she has earned.

Just today, staff people from all over this Senate were in our office expressing their admiration for her as she had a reception this afternoon. I am grateful for her efforts and the dedication as a member of my staff. I wish her and her husband, Vince, who retired a few years ago after a career with NASA—he was with NASA during the glory days of the space age—I wish Nancy and her husband, Vince, all the best in their future years. We look forward to seeing you both on a regular basis and thank you again for the great contributions you have made to the success of our office and to the people of the United States.

VETERANS HISTORY PROJECT

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I call to the attention of the Senate the Veterans History Project that is currently being developed by the Library of Congress.

This is a project that is dear to the hearts of all Americans and a project to which the Congress gave our unanimous support when we passed Public Law 106-380 last fall. Just as a new memorial on the Mall will honor our WW II veterans, a living memorial to all our war veterans will be created by the Veterans History Project. This project, which is part of the American Folklife Center at the Library of Congress, will collect oral histories, along with letters, diaries, photographs, and other papers from veterans of World War I, World War II and the Korean, Vietnam, and Persian Gulf wars, as well as from those who served in support of them. The Veterans History Project will create this national collection by creating partnerships and encouraging participation from a wide range of veterans' organizations, military installations, civic groups, museums, libraries, historical societies, students and teachers, colleges and universities, and citizens and the families of our veterans nationwide.

This is an important national project and one that we should continue to support. Of the 19 million war veterans living in our Nation today, nearly 1,500 of them die each day—1,100 of them having served in World War II. While their own monument is under construction, we can build a lasting national collection that will preserve their wartime memories, actions and experiences. Through this national project we have to encourage local projects and local archives that will collect oral histories of all our war veterans for our children and our children's children.

This is a project worthy of consideration by all Senators as they return home for Memorial Day. That is the reason I come to the Chamber.

I thank our colleagues in the Senate, Senator CHUCK HAGEL and Senator MAX CLELAND for bringing this opportunity to us and to the citizens of our great Nation—a lasting democracy due to the sacrifices of the men and women honored by the Veterans History Project.

I will support funding for this project and for the operations of the Library's American Folklife Center, where the veteran's collections will be preserved and shared with all. Nearly all of us have worked closely with the American Folklife Center. Many of you will recall the recent Local Legacies Project, done for the Library of Congress bicentennial last year, and other programs it has undertaken over the years.

As we approach Memorial Day I ask the Senate to reaffirm our commitment to our veterans and show our support for the Veterans History Project. As a grateful nation, we must preserve and honor their memories for generations to come.

A VICTORY FOR PEOPLE WHO CARE ABOUT KIDS

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, at the beginning of this year, the State of Michigan enacted a "shall issue" law that makes it easier to obtain a concealed carry permit and will increase the number of guns on our streets. The law, which was scheduled to go into effect on July 1, 2001, takes discretion away from local gun boards and requires authorities to issue a license to carry a concealed weapon to any applicant who meets basic eligibility requirements.

Most law enforcement groups in Michigan reject the proliferation of concealed weapons in our communities and warn that this law will move our State in a dangerous direction. Similarly, gun safety groups, including the Michigan Partnership to Prevent Gun Violence and the Michigan Million Mom March, have voiced their concerns that the expected ten-fold increase in the number of concealed weapons on Michigan's streets would jeopardize the safety of our children. These and other groups that oppose the "shall issue" law joined together to form the coalition of People Who Care About Kids and successfully collected more than 230,000 signatures on a petition calling for a referendum on the law.

Last week, the Michigan State Court of Appeals came down on the side the voters of the State, agreeing that they should be able to decide on the law in a referendum. The appeals panel stated that “the overarching right of the people to their ‘direct legislative voice’ ” overrides a constitutional prohibition against referenda for laws that include spending provisions. Unless the decision is overturned by the Michigan Supreme Court, the voters of Michigan will be able to voice their opinions on the “shall issue” law in a referendum in November 2002.

This unanimous decision by the State Court of Appeals panel is not only a victory for the voters of Michigan, but also for the safety of our children and the security of our communities. I am convinced the people of Michigan want to find ways to decrease the amount of gun violence in our communities, not remove discretion from local gun boards with the goal of increasing the number of guns on our streets. I am pleased that they will have a say in this important issue that so directly impacts their lives.

FINAL PASSAGE OF THE TAX BILL

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, this is a sad day for the U.S. Senate and America's economic future. Yesterday we rushed through an unbalanced, backloaded, overbloated tax-cut that we literally cannot afford, that runs a substantial risk of driving us back into the ditch of deficits and higher interest rates, and in the end could affect our long-term prosperity which we have worked so hard to build. And for what purpose? To meet the arbitrary deadline of passing a bill by Memorial Day.

This bill and the whole process for considering it is a case study in irresponsibility, not just fiscally but governmentally. By squandering the surplus this way, we are squandering an historic opportunity to meet a number of national needs and to strengthen our economic security in the coming years. We lost an opportunity to pass not just a tax plan but a prosperity plan, geared to long-term economic growth. We lost an opportunity to pay down the debt and keep interest rates low.

We may well have lost an opportunity to pass a strong prescription drug benefit and strengthen the long-term stability of Medicare and Social Security for the retirement of the baby boom generation. And we may have lost an opportunity to make strategic investments in education, job training, scientific research—all of which we know are critical to expanding the winners' circle in this innovation economy. In short, we lost an opportunity to make the surplus work for us. Instead, we have given it all away in a tax cut tilted to give the most help to those who need it least.

I support tax cuts, and have voted for tax cuts, but they should be cuts we can afford. Some of the tax reductions for which I have advocated were included in this bill as part of the manager's amendment. Specifically, this amendment makes the R&D tax credit permanent, an issue on which I have been working for many years, makes a start on college tuition deductibility, and accelerates the wage credits for Round II Enterprise Zones, a program I have supported from its inception. These provisions, however, do not make up for the fiscal irresponsibility and lack of vision this bill represents.

I cautioned earlier this year that ten years from now, we will be judged by the decisions we make today. People will ask, did we fully understand the awesome changes taking place in our economy and in our society? Did we create a plan to assure our ongoing prosperity? Did we direct our unprecedented surpluses into investments with the greatest returns? Did we give our workers the tools they needed to seize the opportunities an innovation economy offers? And, were we guided by the fiscal discipline and values that had brought us so far in the past decade? Much to my chagrin, I am no longer confident that these questions will be answered affirmatively.

Indeed, we have passed a bill that relies heavily on a surplus whose size six months down the road is unclear, to say nothing of its dimensions ten years from now. The inflated size of this tax cut may well force us to set discretionary spending at levels that don't keep pace with inflation. We may be forced to return to the fiscally-destructive practice of deficit spending by borrowing from the Social Security and Medicare trust funds. Additionally, this tax cut pays nothing but lip service to reducing the national debt, the very step that has proven to be so valuable to the health of our economy in recent years by keeping the cost of capital and interest rates low. In fact, this bill crowds our ability to devote a single dollar, aside from funds already committed to the Medicare and Social Security Trust Funds, toward debt reduction.

I am especially concerned that the idea of an immediate economic stimulus has been abandoned. During the debate on the budget resolution last month, we Democrats argued that the economy needed a jump-start and our colleagues on both sides of the aisle agreed to adopt a stimulus package. Our plan was fair. It was fast. And it was fiscally responsible. It was fair because it was directed at every American who paid any taxes—payroll or income. It was fast because it would go into effect immediately, with rebate checks being cut within weeks. And not least of all, it was fiscally responsible because it fit into a balanced budget that did not spend money we do not have. Unfortunately, the so-called stimulus included in the tax bill we just passed does none of those things.

This bill may prove to be nothing but a one trick pony, and, if so, it's a bad trick to play on the American people.

No matter the well-intentioned claims of my colleagues, this bill promises something we cannot deliver. It abandons fiscal discipline, fails to invest the wealth our Nation has earned over the past eight years, and may send us back down the road to debt, higher interest rates, and higher unemployment. It is not what the American people deserve, nor is it what they expected it to be.

LOCAL LAW ENFORCEMENT ACT OF 2001

Mr. SMITH of Oregon. Mr. President, I rise today to speak about hate crimes legislation I introduced with Senator KENNEDY last month. The Local Law Enforcement Act of 2001 would add new categories to current hate crimes legislation sending a signal that violence of any kind is unacceptable in our society.

I would like to describe a heinous crime that occurred July 25, 2000 in Barron, Wisconsin. Raymond C. Welton, 33, was charged with a hate crime in the murder of Michael Hatch, a 22-year-old hearing-impaired, disabled man on October 20. Prosecutors contend that Hatch was robbed and beaten to death with a tire iron in part because his assailants thought he was gay. Three perpetrators allegedly lured Hatch from a bar because one of them had gone to school with him and thought he was gay. They allegedly shouted gay slurs during the beating.

I believe that government's first duty is to defend its citizens, to defend them against the harms that come out of hate. The Local Law Enforcement Enhancement Act of 2001 is now a symbol that can become substance. I believe that by passing this legislation, we can change hearts and minds as well.

ADOPTION TAX CREDIT

Ms. LANDRIEU. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to thank the Chairman from Iowa, and the Ranking Member from Montana for their distinguished leadership on the tax cut bill. Their support of the adoption tax credit amendment made the crucial difference in its being accepted as part of the manager's package. Both are true friends to children and families and should be commended for their willingness to ensure that this bill reflects the needs of adoptive parents. I would also like to thank Senators LINCOLN, LIEBERMAN, JOHNSON, MIKULSKI, BOXER, DASCHLE, DEWINE, HARKIN, SANTORUM, SHELBY, STEVENS, COCHRAN, DAYTON, DURBIN, HUTCHINSON, KOHL, SESSIONS, SMITH of New Hampshire, and FITZGERALD.

This is not the first time that I have come to this floor to urge my colleagues to support efforts to strengthen and extend the adoption tax credit. In fact, each and every time that this body considered the issue of tax relief, the senior Senator from Idaho and I have come before the Senate to argue that the adoption tax credit should be included. And while this is not the first time that this important measure has been successfully adopted as part of a tax bill, I am hopeful that it will be the last.

Because of our action here, 60,000 plus children will find their "forever families" in the year to come. Parents who have long dreamed about adopting will finally have the help necessary to make those dreams a reality. I could be wrong, but I would guess that few parts of the tax code can compare to the impact had by the adoption tax credit. Each time a child finds a loving home, we have not only saved children and strengthened a family, but we have also saved billions of taxpayer's dollars.

I believe that there is no such thing as an unwanted child, merely unfound families. This tax credit will help to find more families for more children. I would like to commend my colleagues for their support in passing this important amendment. With it, we will be yet another step closer to the day when no child goes to bed feeling alone, unloved or unwanted.

LYME DISEASE

Mr. SANTORUM. Mr. President, I rise to join my colleague, Senator CHRIS DODD of Connecticut, in lending support to the pressing cause of addressing the ruinous effects of America's most common tick-borne illness, Lyme disease.

I thank the senior Senator from Connecticut for his long involvement and leadership on this most important public health issue. With thousands of Americans contracting Lyme disease each year, it is critical that we work aggressively to wage a comprehensive fight against this devastating tick-borne illness, which costs our country dearly in the way of medical expenditures and human suffering. The current lack of physician knowledge about Lyme and the inadequacies of existing detection methods are particularly problematic, and only serve to compound this growing public health hazard.

Approximately one year ago, I joined with Senator DODD, and Representatives SMITH of New Jersey, PITTS and GOODE to request of the U.S. General Accounting Office a report on some of the current concerns surrounding public and private efforts dedicated to Lyme. We asked about the past and present funding trends within the NIH and CDC and to what projects these resources are being devoted, and we asked about possible conflicts of interest within government agencies related to decisions about the diagnosis, treatment and prevention of Lyme.

Although we have not yet received the official report of the GAO, we have received some preliminary findings that Senator DODD and I believed merited the development of new legislation that we are introducing today the Lyme and Infectious Disease Information and Fairness in testing "LIIFT" Act to build upon the solid foundation laid by the Lyme Disease Initiative of 1999.

The GAO's preliminary findings suggest that the CDC and NIH have lost sight of what ultimately matters to the people living with Lyme: Accurate diagnostic tools, access to effective treatment and ultimately a cure. Needless to say, the patient community is not well-served if these areas are not given proper priority at the CDC and NIH.

Between 1991 and 1999, the annual number of reported cases of Lyme disease increased by an astonishing 72 percent. Even as the dramatic increase took place, according to the GAO, funding for Lyme disease at the CDC has increased by only 7 percent over the past 10 years.

Whereas we applaud NIH for its work and we are pleased to see that Congress' efforts to double NIH funding have directly benefited Lyme research, poor coordination and the lack of proper funding at the CDC has left too many questions unanswered. Senator DODD and I share the frustration of the patient community; why hasn't all of this research translated into better treatment? We similarly believe that the CDC's lack of proper funding and attention to tick-borne disease has stalled progress in the development of more accurate diagnostic tests for Lyme disease.

The LIIFT Act will seek to remedy these issues by ensuring that the proper collaboration is taking place on the Federal level the proper collaboration between the Federal Government and the people it serves. Our bill will also address the funding imbalances for Lyme disease activities at the CDC that has inhibited the development of accurate detection methods and treatment for Lyme.

With this new legislation we are calling for the formation of a Department of Health and Human Services Advisory Committee that will bring Federal agencies, such as the CDC and the NIH, to the table with patient organizations, clinicians, and members of the scientific community. This Committee will report its recommendations to the Secretary of HHS. It will ensure that all scientific viewpoints are given consideration at NIH and the CDC and will give a voice to the patient community which has often been left out of the dialogue.

The LIIFT Act will also provide an additional $14 million over the next two years to the CDC to ensure that the Centers work with researchers around the country to develop better diagnostic tests and to increase its efforts to educate the public about Lyme disease. We also call upon the NIH to place an emphasis on funding the neurologic and vascular aspects of Lyme disease and to recruit a larger pool of researchers.

In addition, this legislation authorizes an additional $7 million to fund the extraordinary research and eradication efforts already underway at the U.S. Army Center for Health Promotion and Preventive Medicine located in the Aberdeen Proving Ground in Maryland.

I sincerely hope that our colleagues will join Senator DODD and me in this most worthy cause and cosponsor the LIIFT Act. Lyme disease patients and their families have waited too long for a responsive plan of action to address their suffering and needs.

The Tireless efforts of the Lyme patient and advocacy community have been instrumental in raising awareness and mobilizing support for this issue, and for this both Senator DODD and I thank them. I look forward to working with them, Senator DODD, and our colleagues to synthesize the best ideas from last session's Lyme Disease Initiative and the new LIIFT Act, and to enact into law strong legislation to help correct the mistakes of the past, and to give greater hope for the future by ensuring patients that the Federal Government is doing everything in its power to provide better treatments and ultimately, a cure.

WORLD WAR II MEMORIAL

Ms. LINCOLN. Mr. President, in anticipation of Memorial Day, I rise to honor the 1.1 million Americans who have given their lives for this country. Their lasting legacy is freedom, both here and abroad.

I hope this Memorial Day will be a special one for the World War II generation. Earlier this week, the Senate cleared the way for the construction of the World War II Memorial on the National Mall. The brave men and women of this generation will finally receive the national recognition they deserve.

I want to take time today to acknowledge the contributions of the nearly four million veterans of the Korean War. This issue is a personal one for me. My father is a veteran of the Korean War and I know his generation made tremendous sacrifices. During the course of the war, over 36,000 Americans lost their lives and over 90,000 were wounded.

My father served in Korea as an enlisted man. He left for the 38th Parallel shortly after graduating from high school. When he returned, he married my mother and went to college at the University of Arkansas where he joined the ROTC. Upon graduation, his ROTC unit was activated and Dad left for the Azores for a 12 month assignment.

Like many members of the military, my father didn't endure the sacrifice of service alone. My mother boarded a military flight to the Azores when my sister Mary was only 6 months old to join my father. The military didn't provide housing for married service members on the island and so my father had to make alternative arrangements before my mother and sister could join him. Once reunited, they lived as normal a life as possible in a trailer on an island in the Atlantic thousands of miles from home.

Seldom do we properly recognize the contribution and sacrifice spouses and other family members make when a loved one joins the Armed Forces. So while we honor our nation's veterans on Memorial Day, let us also salute the spouses and other family members who share the sacrifice and burdens of military service.

To commemorate this Memorial Day, I urge my colleagues and all Americans to watch the PBS documentary Korean War Stories. It will air in the evening on Sunday May 27th. This documentary has been sponsored by the Disabled American Veterans as a tribute to those who served during the Korean War.

Our Korean War veterans served this nation with honor, dignity, and dedication, and, in the end, they preserved freedom on the Korean peninsula.

I have the highest respect for the men and women who have served our nation in the Armed Forces, especially those who gave their lives to protect the freedoms we enjoy today. Their sacrifice on behalf of our country is commendable and I extend my sincere appreciation for the honorable service they have given.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

TRIBUTE TO MAJOR HARRY A. AMESBURY, JR.

• Mr. CRAIG. Mr. President, today I pay tribute to Major Harry A. Amesbury, Jr. who after 29 years is finally being returned home to his family. On April 26, 1972, Harry was the commander of a C-130E aircraft on a night emergency resupply mission to the besieged city of An Loc, Republic of Vietnam. He knew there was a concentration of enemy anti-aircraft defenses because he made the flight the night before. His aircraft was struck by the intense enemy fire and shot down. He has been missing in action since that date, but not forgotten. An Idaho resident and career Air Force officer with over sixteen years of service to his country, he was survived by his parents Dr. and Mrs. Harry A. Amesbury, Sr., who are now deceased, his wife Mary Amesbury Predoehl, and four sons: Harry Kurt Amesbury, David John Amesbury, Robert Stephen Amesbury, and Alan Keith Amesbury. He is also survived by David's wife Marjan, their son Brendan, and the twins Cameron and Shannon, as well as, Stephen's wife Mary and their sons Ryan and Connor. I know I speak for all my colleagues in the Senate in expressing my profound sorrow to the Amesbury family for their loss.

In a letter to his parents on 15 April 1972, just eleven days before his death, Harry wrote: "I want you to know that if something should happen to me, that I am doing what needs to be done and I am doing what I think is right". He was a thorough professional who believed in his country and his duties as an Air Force Officer. He knew that his fellow service members needed his help, so he didn't hesitate when called on to make that final flight.

Harry received the Silver Star for his valor in attempting the mission to An Loc. He also received the Distinguished Flying Cross for a mission the previous day, when his aircraft was heavily damaged by enemy anti-aircraft fire. These final acts of courage, following days and years of courageous acts, demonstrate the commitment that Major Harry Amesbury had for military service, his dedication to our country, and the importance he placed on performing his duty. Unfortunately, this tragedy reminds us once again of the painful costs of answering the call of service to our country, and the sacrifices our military members make for others who need help. We will never know how many lives in An Loc were saved because of the valor of Major Harry Amesbury, but as we pay homage to his memory, let us rededicate ourselves in the days and months ahead to the ideals of our great nation, and keep faith with all brave Americans who choose to wear the uniform and ensure that their sacrifices were not made in vain.

I hope it is of some comfort to the family that Major Harry Amesbury, Jr. is finally returning home to Idaho. It was always his plan to return to the State after completing his Air Force career, and even bought land overlooking the Snake River, near Marsing, where he planned to build his retirement home.

On Memorial Day at Mountain Home AFB, there will be an official ceremony which will include the rendering of military honors and one final opportunity to express appreciation for his service and his sacrifice. His family will then travel into the mountains, to a place that he loved to go with his children, and say goodbye in their own way.

I am very proud to recognize Major Harry A. Amesbury, Jr. and tell him and his family, Thank You.●

TRIBUTE TO JANE ELLEN STRITZINGER

• Mr. SHELBY. Mr. President, today I pay tribute to one of this country's great educators as she retires after over 30 years of teaching English in my home state of Alabama. This week marks the end of an outstanding career for Jane Ellen Stritzinger as she retires from Demopolis High School. Mrs. Stritzinger has taught thousands of students to write well and motivated many to pursue higher education. I join her family, friends, fellow teachers and the students she has guided in congratulating and wishing her well in retirement. Her devoted service to the young people of Alabama has made both the state and the nation better places. Her leadership and teaching will be sorely missed.

Mrs. Stritzinger's awards, activities and leadership positions are far too numerous to list exhaustively, yet a few bear special mention. She was selected as the Alabama State Teacher of the Year, District V winner for 1999-2000. Mrs. Stritzinger has also received the University of West Alabama College of Liberal Arts Alumni Achievement Award, the Tombigbee Girl Scout Council Outstanding Educator Award and the Alabama Council of Teachers of English Distinguished Service Award. She has also been recognized three times by the National Endowment for the Humanities with Awards allowing her to attend special seminars. In addition to her support of educational efforts, Mrs. Stritzinger has played active roles in numerous community organizations including historical, alumni and religious organizations.

Mrs. Stritzinger spent most of her career teaching English and literature to twelfth grade students at Demopolis High School where she has been responsible for the Advanced Placement, Honors and College-bound English classes. In addition, she has served as the Chairperson of the English Department at Demopolis High School for twenty years and of both the English Curriculum Development and the English Textbook Committees. Early in her career, she taught English at Uniontown High School and remedial reading at Westside School and served as Assistant Director of the Alabama Consortium for the Development of Higher Education. She has helped mold the minds of students as they prepared for college and for life. Her focus on encouraging and recognizing academic excellence extended beyond her classroom to the numerous activities and organizations she helped coordinate including founding the local chapter of the National Honor Society.

Mrs. Stritzinger holds a strong belief in encouraging students to improve their reading abilities and develop strong writing skills. She championed using the Accelerated Reader Program and applied for her school to become an Alabama Reading Initiative Demonstration site. She devoted countless hours over the years to the Alabama Penman Creative Writing Contest, the Gulf Coast Writing Conference, the Program to Recognize Excellence in High School Literary Magazines, a tutorial program for high school students and the Beta Club. Mrs. Stritzinger participated in a program on writing instruction filmed by the State Department of Education for Alabama Public Television.

Strong schools foster strong students and Mrs. Stritzinger worked diligently to improve the quality of our Alabama schools. She was selected as Chairperson of the Ten Year Study for Demopolis High School for Southern Association accreditation and as Teachers' Representative to the Demopolis Educational Foundation. She served as chairperson of the Grants Committee for the Educational Foundation and coordinated a system-wide meeting for reading and language teachers on improving test scores. Mrs. Stritzinger represented Demopolis High School on the Mid-South Humanities Project, the University of Alabama Bio-Prep Workshops and a School Improvement Workshop. She also served on an Alabama State Department of Education Evaluation Team to accredit Judson College. Central to her effort to improve our schools was her twenty years as a Cooperating Teacher providing guidance to student teachers seeking classroom experience. She also played an active role in encouraging the use of technology in the classroom including through the use of the Internet.

Mrs. Stritzinger earned both Masters and Bachelors degrees in English and maintains affiliations with numerous education associations. She has been married to Pete Stritzinger for 36 years and while pursuing this busy career raised two daughters—Ann and Gloria. Mrs. Stritzinger's commitment to Demopolis Schools continues a tradition begun by her mother Lucille Lewis who was also a long serving public school teacher.

No one can begin to quantify the amazing impact that a teacher of Mrs. Stritzinger's ability has had on her students and on her community. The success stories are myriad and many of Mrs. Stritzinger's students have risen to become pillars of their communities. Often her students have been inspired by Mrs. Stritzinger's teaching to pursue careers as teachers or careers which depend upon the critical thinking and strong writing skills fostered by her classes.

As you can tell from my description of her career, Mrs. Stritzinger's involvement in the Demopolis City School System will be hard to replace. Although I am sure she will stay involved with the schools and the community after retirement, she has begun a legacy of success that is sure to be continued. I am confident that her former students and fellow teachers will continue to rise to the challenges that Mrs. Stritzinger posed to them.

Congratulations again Mrs. Stritzinger on such an outstanding career.●

TRIBUTE TO REVEREND MARK HURLEY

● Mr. SMITH of New Hampshire. Mr. President, I rise today to pay tribute to the Reverend Mark J. Hurley, the former bishop of the Catholic Diocese of Santa Rosa, California. Bishop Hurley passed away on Monday, February 5, 2001, after undergoing surgery for an aneurysm. Mark Hurley was one of two priests born to a proud Irish Catholic family. His brother, Francis Hurley, is the Archbishop of Anchorage, Alaska.

I had the great fortune to make the acquaintance of Mark Hurley several years ago while traveling in California. He was a deeply religious man, as you would expect, and a very learned individual and the author of several books. He lectured about the tragedy of abortion and wrote extensively about medical and genetic research and individual privacy. But he will be remembered most of all for his extraordinary work as the bishop of the six-county North Coast diocese from 1969–1986.

Pope Paul VI appointed Mark Hurley second bishop of the Santa Rosa diocese in 1969. Prior to his appointment, he was a teacher and administrator for Catholic high schools in San Francisco, Marin and Oakland and served as vicar general of the Archdiocese of San Francisco. He would become Santa Rosa's longest-serving bishop since the diocese was created. Most importantly, Bishop Hurley was credited with saving the diocese from financial ruin. When he took office the diocese was over $12 million in debt, including $7 million owed to parishes and other organizations within the diocese. By imposing strict spending limits, a building moratorium and other cutbacks he was able to orchestrate the financial recovery that was so desperately needed.

After his tenure, Pope John Paul II rewarded Reverend Hurley's efforts by transferring him to the Vatican where he was consular to the Sacred Congregation for Catholic Education and a member of the Secretariat for Non-Believers. He returned to the United States and retired in San Francisco, the same city in which he was born on December 13, 1919.

He was acknowledged by many as an intellectual and a world leader on religious matters, but it was his successful tenure as bishop of Santa Rosa for which he will be remembered most. Santa Rosa's current bishop, Daniel Walsh, said of Mark Hurley, "I believe his most esteemed role and responsibility was that of Bishop of Santa Rosa. He labored here from November 1969 to April 1986. He made a great impact on the diocese and we are all beneficiaries of his ministry here."

With the death of bishop Hurley the Lord has lost a dutiful servant, the Catholic faith has lost a pillar of virtue and our nation has lost a loving soul that quietly touched and improved the lives of many. I know I speak for all my colleagues in extending our condolences to his brother, Bishop Francis Hurley, his sister Phyllis Porter of San Francisco and to the rest of his family and friends. May he rest in peace.●

MARY HARMON WEEKS ELEMENTARY SCHOOL

● Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I rise to make a few comments to congratulate the Mary Harmon Weeks Elementary School in Kansas City, Missouri, on receiving 3rd place in the 18th "Annual Set a Good Example School Competition."

The "Set a Good Example Campaign" is popular with students and teachers alike because it motivates, recognizes and awards student-designed and run projects. It has proven to be a very successful and inspirational method for pulling together business people, educators, youth counselors, parents and students behind the effort to eradicate illegal drugs, crime and violence from our nation's schools.

The students at Mary Harmon Weeks Elementary School successfully put to work 21 precepts from a common sense moral code booklet titled The Way to Happiness including, "Try to treat others as you would want them to treat you."

I would like to applaud the students of Mary Harmon Weeks Elementary School and their teacher Gilbert Lowe for the outstanding accomplishment. Sometimes it is very hard for young people to stand out from the crowd and not give in to peer pressure. The choices the students at Mary Harmon Weeks Elementary School have made to stay away from drugs and to promote a safe school environment is a mature and responsible decision. It will not only benefit them as individuals but will bring numerous benefits to the school and community as well.●

RECOGNITION OF MR. KENNETH HOOD

● Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, today Mr. Kenneth Hood of Gunnison, MS, will conclude his term as President of Delta Council.

Delta Council is an economic development organization representing eighteen counties of Northwest Mississippi. Organized in 1935, Delta Council brings together the agricultural, business, and professional leadership of the area to solve common problems and promote the economic development of the Mississippi Delta region.

As President of Delta Council, Mr. Hood has been an articulate spokesman and leader in the effort to define an effective agriculture policy, and to confront the needs for better schools, water resources, and transportation.

Kenneth Hood has been committed to Mississippi agriculture since he first began farming in 1960. He is president of Hood Gin Company and Chief Executive Officer of Perthshire Farms, a family farm operation. He is also president of Hood Equipment Company, an agricultural and construction equipment dealer located in Batesville and Bruce, MS.

Mr. Hood has served also as the President of the Mississippi and National Association of Farmer Elected Committeemen, a member of the Board of Directors of Staplcotn, a founding director of Delta Wildlife, a past chairman of the National and Southern Cotton Ginners Association, and Chairman of the Mississippi Boll Weevil Management Corporation. He has recently been chosen as the new Chairman of the National Cotton Council. I am confident that Mr. Hood will be an important source of information and advice for Congress as we draft a new farm bill.●

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Ms. Evans, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session the Presiding Officer laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

REPORT ON THE NATIONAL EMERGENCIES WITH RESPECT TO THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF YUGOSLAVIA (SERBIA AND MONTENEGRO) AND KOSOVO—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 23

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report; which was referred to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

To the Congress of the United States:

As required by section 401(c) of the National Emergencies Act, 50 U.S.C. 1641(c) and section 204(c) of the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (IEEPA), 50 U.S.C. 1703(c), I transmit herewith a 6-month periodic report on the national emergency with respect to the Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) emergency declared in Executive Order 12808 on May 10, 1992, and with respect to the Kosovo emergency declared in Executive Order 13088 on June 9, 1998.

GEORGE W. BUSH.
THE WHITE HOUSE, May 24, 2001.

REPORT ON THE CONTINUATION OF EMERGENCY WITH RESPECT TO THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF YUGOSLAVIA (SERBIA AND MONTENEGRO) THE BOSNIAN SERBS, AND KOSOVO—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 24

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report; which was referred to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

To the Congress of the United States:

Section 202(d) of the National Emergencies Act (50 U.S.C. 1622(d)), provides for the automatic termination of a national emergency unless, prior to the anniversary date of its declaration, the President publishes in the Federal Register and transmits to the Congress a notice stating that the emergency is to continue in effect beyond the anniversary date. I have sent the enclosed notice to the Federal Register for publication, stating that the national emergencies declared with respect to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) (the "FRY (S&M)") in 1992 and with respect to Kosovo in 1998, are to continue beyond May 30, 2001, and June 9, 2001, respectively. The most recent notice continuing these emergencies was published in the Federal Register on May 26, 2000.

With respect to the 1992 national emergency, on December 27, 1995, President Clinton issued Presidential Determination 96-7, directing the Secretary of the Treasury, inter alia, to suspend the application of sanctions imposed on the FRY (S&M) and to continue to block property previously blocked until provision is made to address claims or encumbrances, including the claims of the other successor states of the former Yugoslavia. This sanctions relief, in conformity with United Nations Security Council Resolution 1022 of November 22, 1995 (hereinafter the "Resolution"), was an essential factor motivating Serbia and Montenegro's acceptance of the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina initialed in Dayton on November 21, 1995, and signed in Paris on December 14, 1995 (hereinafter the "Peace Agreement").

Sanctions against both the FRY (S&M) and the Bosnian Serbs were subsequently terminated by United Nations Security Council Resolution 1074 of October 1, 1996. This termination, however, did not end the requirement of the Resolution that those blocked funds and assets that are subject to claims and encumbrances remain blocked, until unblocked in accordance with applicable law.

Until the status of all remaining blocked property is resolved, the Peace Agreement implemented, and the terms of the Resolution met, this situation continues to pose an unusual and extraordinary threat to the national security, foreign policy, and economy of the United States. For these reasons, I have determined that the 1992 emergency, and the measures adopted pursuant thereto, must continue beyond May 30, 2001.

With respect to the 1998 national emergency regarding Kosovo, on January 17, 2001, President Clinton issued Executive Order 13192 in view of the peaceful democratic transition begun in the FRY (S&M); the continuing need to promote full implementation of United Nations Security Council Resolution 827 of May 25, 1993, and subsequent resolutions calling for all states to cooperate fully with the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY); the illegitimate control over FRY (S&M) political institutions and economic resources or enterprises exercised by former President Slobodan Milosevic, his close associates and other persons, and those individuals' capacity to repress democracy or perpetrate or promote further human rights abuses; and the continuing threat to regional stability and implementation of the Peace Agreement. The order lifts and modifies, with respect to future transactions, most of the economic sanctions imposed against the FRY (S&M) in 1998 and 1999 with regard to the situation in Kosovo. At the same time, the order imposes restrictions on transactions with certain persons described in section 1(a) of the order, namely Slobodan Milosevic, his close associates and supporters and persons under open indictment for war crimes by ICTY. The order also provides for the continued blocking of property or interests in property blocked prior to the order's effective date due to the need to address claims or encumbrances involving such property.

Because the crisis with respect to the situation in Kosovo and with respect to Slobodan Milosevic, his close associates and supporters and persons under open indictment for war crimes by ICTY has not been resolved, and because the status of all previously blocked property has yet to be resolved, this situation continues to pose an unusual and extraordinary threat to the national security and foreign policy of the United States. For these reasons, I have determined that the emergency declared with respect to Kosovo, and the measures adopted pursuant thereto, must continue beyond June 9, 2001.

GEORGE W. BUSH.
THE WHITE HOUSE, May 24, 2001.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The following petitions and memorials were laid before the Senate and were referred or ordered to lie on the table as indicated:

POM-72. A resolution adopted by the Senate of the Legislature of the State of Hawaii relative to appropriated funds for children with disabilities; to the Committee on Appropriations.

SENATE RESOLUTION NO. 47

Whereas, under Title 20, section 1411(a) of the United States Code, the maximum amount of federal funds that a state may receive for special education and related services is the number of children with disabilities in the State who are receiving special education and related services multiplied by forty percent of the average per-pupil expenditure in public elementary and secondary schools in the United States; and

Whereas, since the enactment of the Education for All Handicapped Children Act of 1975 and its subsequent amendments, including the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act of 1990, Congress has appropriated funds for a maximum of ten per cent of special education and related services for children with disabilities when federal law authorizes the appropriation of up to forty per cent; and

Whereas, the Hawaii Department of Education received approximately $23,500,000 in federal funds during fiscal year 1999-2000 for what was then referred to as "education of the handicapped". If this figure represented an appropriation of funds for ten per cent of special education and related services for children with disabilities, then an appropriation of forty per cent would have equaled $94,000,000; and

Whereas, the difference between an appropriation of forty per cent and an appropriation of ten per cent for "education of the handicapped" would amount to $70,500,000 just for the Department of Education. If the number of students receiving special education and related services equaled 22,000 during the fiscal year 1999-2000, then the difference would have amounted to approximately $3,200 per student; and

Whereas, the State of Hawaii, through the Felix consent decree, is being compelled by the federal district court to make up for more than twenty years of insufficient funding for special education and related services-funding that should have been borne substantially by Congress, which enacted the Education for All Handicapped Children Act of 1975 and the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act of 1990; and

Whereas, if Congress is going to mandate new programs or increase the level of service under existing programs for children with disabilities, and if it is going to give the federal courts unfettered power to enforce these mandates through the imposition of fines and the appointment of masters, then Congress should provide sufficient funding for special education and related services; now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Twenty-first Legislature of the State of Hawaii, Regular Session of 2001, That the United States Congress is requested to appropriate funds for forty per cent of special education and related services for children with disabilities; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this Resolution be transmitted to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, the President pro tempore of the United States Senate, the Vice-President of the United States, and the members of Hawaii's congressional delegation.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. BOND:

S. 945. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to repeal the recognition of capital gain rule for home offices; to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, in 1997 Congress made an important change in the tax code for small businesses by restoring the home-office deduction. That change opened the door for millions of Americans to operate successful small businesses from their homes. Now the home-based financial planner or landscape can use an extra bedroom or a basement to conduct her business without the cost of commercial office space. In many cases, these home offices also allow today's entrepreneurs to spend more time with their family by avoiding the added time and expense of day-care and commuting.

With the restoration of the home-office deduction, however, came a significant new complexity for home-based businesses, depreciation recapture. If a home-based medical transcriber elects to claim the home-office deduction, she will deduct the expenses relating to her home office, such as a portion of her home-owners insurance, utilities, repairs, and maintenance. She is also entitled to depreciate a portion of the cost of her house relating to the home office. But there is a big catch. When the home-based business owner sells her home, she must recapture all of the depreciation deductions and pay income taxes on them, even though her house qualifies for the exclusion from tax for the sale of a principal residence.

The specter of depreciation recapture has several significant ramifications. First, it requires additional record-keeping for home-based business owners, on top of the enormous burdens that the tax code already imposes on a small business. Second, when the home-based business owner decides to sell his home, he must struggle with the complexities of calculating the depreciation recapture or, as is too often the case, he must hire a costly tax professional to undertake the calculations and prepare the required tax forms.

Additionally, the depreciation-recapture requirement creates a disincentive for home-based business owners to claim the home-office deduction in the first place. In fact, I have heard from accountants and tax advisors in my home State of Missouri that they frequently advise their clients to forego the home-office deduction simply to avoid the recordkeeping and complexities associated with recapturing the depreciation. That is clearly not what Congress intended when it restored the home-office deduction in 1997.

In light of this problem, I rise today to introduce the "Home-Office Deduction Simplification Act of 2001." This bill simply repeals the depreciation-recapture requirement and the disincentive for home-based businesses to utilize the home-office deduction. At a time when the Nation's small businesses are feeling real pain from the current economic slow down, this bill will provide real relief, not only when they sell their homes, but today by giving them the benefit of the home-office deduction that Congress intended.

It is my pleasure to be working with Congressman DONALD MANZULLO, Chairman of the House Committee on Small Business, to raise this issue in both Chambers. I urge my colleagues in the Senate to support this legislation and make the home-office deduction as simple and accessible as possible. Our home-based businesses across the nation deserve nothing less.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill and a description of its provisions be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 945

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Home-Office Deduction Simplification Act of 2001".

SEC. 2. REPEAL OF RECOGNITION OF GAIN RULE FOR HOME OFFICE.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Subsection (d) of section 121 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (relating to exclusion of gain from sale of principal residence) is amended by striking paragraph (6) and redesignating paragraphs (7) and (8) as paragraphs (6) and (7), respectively.

(b) EXCEPTION TO TREATMENT AS GAIN FROM DISPOSITION OF PRINCIPAL RESIDENCE.—Subsection (d) of section 1250 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (relating to gain from dispositions of certain depreciable realty) is amended by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(9) HOME OFFICE.—Subsection (a) shall not apply to property described in section 280A(c)(1) which is a portion of the principal residence (within the meaning of section 121) of the taxpayer."

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to sales and exchanges occurring after December 31, 2000.

HOME-OFFICE DEDUCTION SIMPLIFICATION ACT OF 2001—DESCRIPTION OF PROVISIONS

The bill repeals section 121(d)(6) of the Internal Revenue Code. Currently, this provision requires individuals who claim depreciation deductions with respect to a home-office to recapture such deductions upon the sale of their home. As a result, the amount of the recaptured depreciation deductions is subject to income taxation without the benefit of the income-tax exclusion for the sale of a principal residence or the capital-gains tax rates in cases where the exclusion does not apply.

By repealing the depreciation-recapture requirement, the bill eliminates the paperwork and compliance burdens that frequently prevent home-based business owners from claiming the home-office deduction. The bill will be effective for sales or exchanges of homes occurring after December 31, 2000.

By Ms. SNOWE (for herself, Ms. MIKULSKI, and Mr. HARKIN):

S. 946. A bill to establish an Office on Women's Health within the Department of Health and Human Services; to the Committee on Health, Education, Labor, and Pensions.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the Women's Health Office Act of 2001 and I am pleased to be joined on this legislation by my friends and colleagues Senators MIKULSKI and HARKIN. Companion legislation to this bill has been introduced in the House by Congresswomen CONNIE MORELLA and CAROLYN MALONEY.

The Women's Health Office Act of 2001 provides permanent authorization for Offices of Women's Health in five Federal agencies: the Department of Health and Human Services, HHS; the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, CDC; the Agency for Health Care Research and Quality, AHRQ; the Health Resources and Services Administration, HRSA; and the Food and Drug Administration, FDA.

Currently, only two women's health offices in the Federal Government have statutory authorization: the Office of Research on Women's Health at the National Institutes of Health, NIH, and the Office for Women's Services within the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, SAMHSA.

For too many years, women's health care needs were ignored or poorly understood, and women were systematically excluded from important health research. One famous medical study on breast cancer examined hundreds of men. Another federally funded study examined the ability of aspirin to prevent heart attacks in 20,000 medical doctors, all of whom were men, despite the fact that heart disease is a leading cause of death among women.

Today, Members of Congress and the American public understand the importance of ensuring that both genders benefit equally from medical research and health care services.

Throughout my tenure in the House and Senate, I have worked hard to expose and eliminate this health care gender gap and improve women's access to affordable, quality health services. As coauthors of the Congressional Caucus for Women's Issues, CCWI, Representative Pat Schroeder and I, along with Representative Henry Waxman, called for a GAO investigation, in the beginning of 1990, into the inclusion of women and minorities in medical research at the National Institutes of Health.

This study documented the widespread exclusion of women from medical research, and spurred the Caucus to introduce the first Women's Health Equity Act, WHEA, in 1990. This comprehensive legislation provided Congress with its first broad, forward-looking health agenda designed to redress the historical inequities that face women in medical research, prevention and services.

Three years later, Congress enacted legislation mandating the inclusion of women and minorities in clinical trials at NIH through the National Institutes of Health Revitalization Act of 1993, P.L. 103-43. Also included in the NIH Revitalization Act was language establishing the NIH Office of Research on Women's Health, language based on my original Office of Women's Health bill that was introduced in the 101st Congress.

Yet, despite all the progress that we have made, there is still a long way to go on women's health care issues. Last May, the GAO released a report, a 10-year update, on the status of women's research at NIH, "NIH Has Increased Its Efforts to Include Women in Research". This report found that since the first GAO report and the 1993 legislation, NIH had made significant progress toward including women as subjects in both intramural and external clinical trials.

However, the report noted that the Institute had made less progress in implementing the requirement that certain clinical trials be designed and carried out to permit valid analysis by sex, which could reveal whether interventions affect women and men differently. The GAO found that NIH researchers would include women in their trials—but then they would either not do analysis on the basis of sex, or if no difference was found, they would not publish the sex-based results.

NIH has done a good job of improving participation of women in clinical trials and has implemented several changes to improve the accuracy and performance for tracking and analyzing data, but our commitment to women's health is not about quotas and numbers. It is about real scientific advances that will improve our knowledge about women's health. At a time when we are on track to double funding for NIH, it is troubling that the agency has still failed to fully implement both its own guidelines and the Congressional directive for sex-based analysis. And as a result, women continue to be shortchanged by Federal research efforts.

The crux of the matter is that NIH's problems exist despite that fact that it has an Office of Women's Health that is codified in law. If NIH is having problems, imagine the difficulties we will have in continuing the focus on women's health in offices that do not have this legislative mandate, and that may change focus with a new HHS Secretary or Agency Director.

Offices of Women's Health across the Public Health Service are charged with coordinating women's health activities and monitoring progress on women's health issues within their respective agencies, and they have been successful in making Federal programs and policies more responsive to women's health issues. Unfortunately, all of the good work these offices are doing is not guaranteed in Public Health Service authorizing law. Providing statutory authorization for federal women's health offices is a critical step in ensuring that women's health research will continue to receive the attention it requires in future years.

Codifying these offices of women's health is important for several reasons. First, it re-emphasizes Congress's commitment to focusing on women's health. Second, it ensures that agencies will enact congressional intent with good faith. Finally, it ensures that appropriations will be available in future years to fulfill these commitments.

By statutorily creating Offices of Women's Health, the Deputy Assistant Secretary for Women's Health will be able to better monitor various Public Health Service agencies and advise them on scientific, legal, ethical and policy issues. Agencies would establish a Coordinating Committee on Women's Health to identify and prioritize which women's health projects should be conducted. This will also provide a mechanism for coordination within and across these agencies, and with the private sector. But most importantly, this bill will ensure the presence of offices dedicated to addressing the ongoing needs and gaps in research, policy, programs, education and training in women's health.

I urge my colleagues to join Senators MIKULSKI, HARKIN, and me in supporting this legislation to help ensure that women's health will never again be a missing page in America's medical textbook.

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. President, I rise to join Senator SNOWE and Senator HARKIN to introduce the Women's Health Office Act of 2001. I am pleased to introduce this bill with my colleagues because it establishes an important framework to address women's health within the Department of Health and Human Services, HHS.

Historically, women's health needs have been ignored or inadequately addressed by the medical establishment and the government. A 1990 General Accounting Office, GAO, report stated that: the National Institutes of Health, NIH, had made little progress in implementing its own inclusion policy on women's participation in clinical trials, NIH inconsistently applied this policy, and NIH had done little to implement analysis of research findings by gender. This was unacceptable. Women make up half or more of the population and must be adequately included in clinical research. That's why

I fought to establish the Office of Research on Women's Health, ORWH, at the NIH 11 years ago. We needed to ensure that women were included in clinical research, so that we would know how treatments for a particular disease or condition would affect women. Would men and women react the same way to a particular treatment for heart disease? We can't answer this question unless both men and women are being included in clinical trials.

While the ORWH began its work in 1990, I wanted to ensure that it stayed at NIH and had the necessary authority to carry out its mission, part of which is to ensure that women are included in clinical research. That's why I authored legislation in 1990 and 1991 to formally establish the ORWH in the Office of the Director of NIH. These provisions were later enacted into law in the NIH Revitalization Act of 1993.

In 1999, Senator HARKIN, Senator SNOWE, and I requested that GAO examine how well the NIH and the ORWH were carrying out the mandates under the NIH Revitalization Act of 1993. The results were mixed. While NIH had made substantial progress in ensuring the inclusion of women in clinical research, it had made less progress in encouraging the analysis of study findings by sex. This means that women are being included in clinical trials, but we are not able to fully reap the benefits of inclusion if the analysis of how interventions affect men and women is not being done or not being reported. While the NIH and others are taking steps to address this, we may be missing information from research done over the last few years about how the outcomes varied or not for men and women.

NIH is but one agency in HHS. Other agencies in HHS do not even have women's health offices. How are these other agencies addressing women's health? Only NIH and the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, SAMHSA, have authorizations in law for offices dedicated to women's health. In 1993, I requested language that accompanied the Fiscal Year 1994 Senate Labor, Health and Human Services Appropriations bill and the Agriculture Appropriations bill to establish and provide funding for Offices of Women's Health in the Centers for the Disease Control and Prevention, CDC, the Food and Drug Administration, FDA, the Health Resources and Services Administration, HRSA, and the Agency for Health Care Policy and Research, AHCPR, now the Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality, AHRQ. Today, there are offices of women's health in HHS, FDA, CDC, and HRSA. AHRQ has a women's health advisor. These offices and advisors are important advocates within the agency for women's health research, programs, and activities. A recent HHS report to Congress describes their roles, responsibilities, and future plans. The degree of support for these offices, in terms of staff and financial resources, varies widely across HHS. This can mean inadequate and inconsistent attention to women's health needs within an agency.

I believe we need a consistent and comprehensive approach to address the needs of women's health in the HHS. This bill would do just that. The Women's Health Office Act of 2001 would authorize women's health offices in HHS, CDC, FDA, AHRQ, and HRSA.

This legislation establishes an important framework and builds on existing efforts. Under the bill, the HHS Office on Women's Health would take over all functions which previously belonged to the current Office of Women's Health of the Public Health Service. The HHS Office would be headed by a Deputy Assistant Secretary for Women's Health who would also chair an HHS Coordinating Committee on Women's Health. The responsibilities of the HHS Office would include establishing short and long-term goals, advising the Secretary of HHS on women's health issues, monitoring and facilitating coordination and stimulating HHS activities on women's health, establishing a National Women's Health Information Center to facilitate exchange of and access to women's health information, and coordinating private sector efforts to promote women's health.

Under this legislation, the Offices of Women's Health in CDC, FDA, HRSA, and AHRQ would be housed in the office of the head of each agency and be headed by a Director appointed by the head of the respective agency. Responsibilities of the offices include: an examination of current women's health activities, the establishment of short-term and long-term goals for women's health, the coordination of women's health activities, and the establishment of a coordinating committee on women's health within each agency to identify women's health needs and make recommendations to the head of the agency. The FDA office would also have specific duties regarding women and clinical trials. The director of each office would serve on HHS's Coordinating Committee on Women's Health. The bill authorizes appropriations for all the offices through 2006.

I believe that this bill will establish a valuable and consistent framework for addressing women's health in the Department of Health and Human Services. It will help to ensure that women's health research will continue to have the attention and resources it needs in the coming years. This bill is a priority of the Women's Health Research Coalition. The Coalition is comprised of academic medical, health and scientific institutions, as well as other organizations interested in and supportive of women's health research. The Women's Research and Education Institute recently released a list of 15 high-impact actions Congress could take to improve the health of midlife women, including the establishment of permanent offices of women's health at HHS and related federal agencies. This bill is supported by over 45 other organizations including the YWCA, the Society for Women's Health Research, the National Partnership for Women and Families, Hadassah, and the American Physical Therapy Association. I encourage my colleagues to cosponsor and support this important legislation, and I ask unanimous consent that a letter of support for this bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WOMEN'S HEALTH RESEARCH COALITION,
Washington, DC, May 14, 2001.

Hon. BARBARA MIKULSKI,
Hart Senate Office Building, U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MIKULSKI: As organizations representing millions of patients, health care professionals, advocates and consumers, we thank you for your leadership in introducing the "Women's Health Office Act of 2001." We enthusiastically support this legislation and look forward to its passage.

Historically, women's health has not been a focus of study nor has there been adequate recognition of the ways in which medical conditions solely or differently affect women and girls. In the decade since attention began to focus on disparities between the genders, scientific knowledge has accumulated alerting us to the importance of considering the biological and psychosocial effects of sex and gender on health and disease.

We support the work of the offices of women's health in ensuring that women and girls benefit equitably in the advances made in medical research and health care services. The legislation will provide for the continued existence, coordination and support of these offices so that they analyze new areas of research, education, prevention, treatment and service delivery.

We appreciate your firm commitment to improving the health of women throughout the nation.

S. 947. A bill to amend the Clean Air Act to permit the Governor of a State to waive the oxygen content requirements for reformulated gasoline and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

Mrs. FEINSTEIN. Mr. President, I am pleased to be joined by Senator JAMES INHOFE of Oklahoma today in introducing a bill to allow the governor of a State to waive the oxygenate content requirement for reformulated or clean-burning gasoline. The bill retains all other provisions of the Clean Air Act to ensure that there is no backsliding on air quality.

We introduce this bill to address the widespread contamination of drinking water by MTBE in California and at least 41 other States.

On April 12, 1999, California Governor Gray Davis asked Carol Browner, who was the Administrator of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, for a waiver of the 2 percent oxygenate requirement. I have written and called former Administrator Browner and the current Administrator Christine Todd Whitman and both former President Clinton and President Bush, urging approval of the waiver. And we are still waiting. It has been two years.

Today, yet again I call on EPA and the Administration to act. In the meantime, I will push Congress to act.

MTBE, Methyl Tertiary Butyl Ether, has been the oxygenate of choice by many refiners in their effort to comply with the Clean Air Act's reformulated gasoline requirements. California Governor Davis has ordered a phase-out in our State, but the Federal law requiring two percent oxygenates remains, putting our State in an untenable position.

This is because the most likely substitute for MTBE to meet the two percent requirement is ethanol, but there is not a sufficient supply of ethanol to meet the demand in California and the rest of the country with the two percent law in place.

With inadequate supplies, we can expect disruptions and price spikes during the peak driving months of this summer, at a time when there are predictions that retail gasoline prices may climb to an unprecedented $3.00 per gallon or more.

The California Energy Commission reports that without relief from the two percent oxygenate mandate, California consumers will pay 3 to 6 cents more per gallon than they need to. This adds up to $450 million a year.

The Clean Air Act requires that cleaner-burning reformulated gasoline, RFG, be sold in so-called "non-attainment" areas with the worst violations of ozone standards: Los Angeles, San Diego, Hartford, New York Philadelphia, Chicago, Baltimore, Houston, Milwaukee, Sacramento. In addition, some States and areas have opted to use reformulated gasoline as way to achieve clean air.

Second, the Act prescribes a formula for reformulated gasoline, including the requirement that reformulated gasoline contain 2.0 percent oxygen, by weight.

In response to this requirement, refiners have put the oxygenate MTBE in over 85 percent of reformulated gasoline now in use. But, there is a problem: increasingly, MTBE is being detected in drinking water. MTBE is a known animal carcinogen and a possible human carcinogen, according to U.S. EPA. It has a very unpleasant odor and taste, as well.

The Feinstein-Inhofe bill would allow governors, upon notification to U.S. EPA, to waive the 2.0 percent oxygenate requirement, as long as the gasoline meets the other requirements in the law for reformulated gasoline.

On July 27th, 1999, the non-partisan, broad-based U.S. EPA Blue Ribbon Panel on Oxygenates in Gasoline recommended that the two percent oxygenate requirement be "removed in order to provide flexibility to blend adequate fuel supplies in a cost-effective manner while quickly reducing usage of MTBE and maintaining air quality benefits."

In addition, the panel agreed that "the use of MTBE should be reduced substantially." Importantly, the panel recommended that "Congress act quickly to clarify federal and state authority to regulate and/or eliminate the use of gasoline additives that pose a threat to drinking water supplies."

The bill we are introducing today, while not totally repealing the two percent oxygenate requirement, moves us in that direction. It gives States that choose to meet Clean Air requirements without oxygenates the option to do so. It allows States that choose an oxygenate, such as ethanol, to do so. Areas required to use reformulated gasoline for cleaner air will still be required to use it. The gasoline will have a different but clean formulation. Areas will continue to have to meet clean air standards.

MTBE has contaminated groundwater at over 10,000 sites in California, according to the Lawrence Livermore Laboratory. Of 10,972 sites groundwater sites sampled, 39 percent had MTBE, according to the State Department of Health Services. Of 765 surface water sources sampled, 287, 38 percent, had MTBE.

Nationally, one EPA-funded study of 34 States found that MTBE was present more than 20 percent of the time in 27 of the States. A U.S. Geological Survey report had similar findings. An October 1999 Congressional Research Service analysis concluded that at least 41 states have had MTBE detections in water.

In California, Governor Davis concluded that MTBE "poses a significant risk to California's environment" and directed that MTBE be phased out in California by December 31, 2002. There is not a sufficient supply of ethanol or other oxygenates to fully replace MTBE in California, without huge gasoline supply disruptions and price spikes.

In addition, California can make clean-burning gas without oxygenates. Therefore, California is in the impossible position of having to meet a federal requirement that is 1. contaminating the water and 2. is not necessary to achieve clean air.

A major University of California study concluded that MTBE provides "no significant air quality benefit" but that its use poses "the potential for regional degradation of water resources, especially ground water. . . ." Oxygenates, say the experts, are not necessary for reformulated gasoline.

California has developed a gasoline formula that provides flexibility and provides clean air. Refiners use an approach called the "predictive model," which guarantees clean-burning RFG gas with oxygenates, with less than two percent oxygenates, and with no oxygenates. Several refiners, including Chevron and Tosco, are selling MTBE-free gas in California, for example.

Under this bill, clean air standards would still have to be met and gasoline would have to meet all other requirements of the federal reformulated gasoline program, including the limits on benzene, heavy metals, and the emission of nitrogen oxides.

This bill will give California and other States the relief they need from an unwarranted, unnecessary requirement. It will give state officials flexibility to determine whether to use oxygenates in their gasoline. The bill does not undo the Clean Air Act. The bill does not degrade air quality.

The two percent oxygenate requirement creates an unnecessary federal "recipe" for gasoline. It causes contamination of groundwater. It adds to the price of gasoline unnecessarily, and it will probably trigger disruptions in gasoline supplies this summer.

I call on this Congress to enact this legislation promptly. Californians do not need to have MTBE-laced drinking water to enjoy the benefits of cleaner air. It is that simple.

I ask unanimous consent that an editorial from the Sacramento Bee describing the MTBE problem in California be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Sacramento Bee, Apr. 23, 2001]

REMEMBER MTBE?—POLITICAL INATTENTION
MAY FUEL PRICE SPIKES

It was a poison brew that sent California into an electricity swoon: rising demand, stagnant supplies and missed political opportunities. Unfortunately, President Bush may be about to stir up virtually the same potion with another source of energy, gasoline. Like the electricity crunch, this gasoline problem can be averted with timely political action.

Under federal law, gasoline in dirty air basins must contain an additive known as an oxygenate. These additives produce cleaner-burning fuel. The primary additive in California is the infamous MTBE; a byproduct of the refinery process. It can cause drinking water to smell like turpentine at minute concentrations, so the state plans to phase out MTBE by the end of 2002.

Refiners say that can produce clean-burning gasoline without an oxygenate but farm politics has kept the requirement in law. For now, the only alternative to MTBE is ethanol, which is made from corn and other grains.

That threatens California with the kind of imbalance between supply and demand that could push up gasoline prices.

Switching from MTBE to ethanol as the additive of choice in California would increase the nation's consumption of ethanol by perhaps 800 million gallons a year. This represents about a 50 percent jump in demand. California produces only 9 million gallons of ethanol a year. That means that the folks who produce ethanol, who are concentrated in Iowa, may be able to extort California with the same vigor as Texas-based electricity marketers.

The seeds of this crisis were planted in some revisions of the federal Clean Air Act, which combined the laudable goal of cleaning up the skies with some unwise restrictions on the legal recipes for fuel. Gov. Gray Davis has been asking for federal government to waive this mandated recipe for the fuel, letting the state meet its air-quality goals in a less expensive way.

Yet with its seven precious electoral votes at stake, Iowa made ethanol a litmus test for any and all presidential candidates, and candidates Bush, like most others, said he would stick to the recipe for gas that favors ethanol.

Is this now the policy of President Bush as well? Bush must say something, and soon.

Ideally, he should use his administrative powers to waive the oxygenate mandate and let various fuel recipes compete on their costs and air-quality benefits. But he must say something. His silence is preventing companies from building ethanol (which could be produced from corn kernels or rice straw) plants in California, if that is what must be done to replace MTBE.

California can't afford the uncertainty on gasoline any more than it can afford uncertainty about whether power plants can be built. For a president who preaches the gospel of sending clear signals to markets, Bush's silence on MTBE and ethanol is an expensive sin.

S. 948. A bill to amend title 23, United States Code, to require the Secretary of Transportation to carry out a grant program for providing financial assistance for local rail line relocation projects, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. President, the history of the geographic expansion of our great Nation is closely tied to the development of our network of railroad lines. Cities and towns sprang up and grew around the railroad tracks that provided transportation vital to their survival and economic future. While the development of modern automobiles, trucks and airplanes have provided alternate forms of transportation, railroads still fulfill important cargo and passenger transportation requirements across the Nation.

However, in many cities and towns across our country, the increased need for motor vehicle transportation, and the road infrastructure to facilitate it, have led to increasing conflicts between railroads, motor vehicles, and people for the use of limited, and increasingly congested, space in downtown areas. Highway-rail grade crossings, even properly marked and gated ones, increase the risk of fatal accidents. Many rail lines cut downtown areas in half while serving few, if any, rail customers in the downtown area. Heavy rail traffic can cut off one side of a town to vital emergency services, including fire, police, ambulance, and hospital services. Downtown rail corridors can hamper economic development by restricting access to bisected areas.

This situation is not the fault of the railroads. They own and have invested heavily to maintain their existing rail lines. These conflicts are due to economic and technological changes that occur faster and more easily than railroads can economically adjust. In 1998, the Congress enacted a landmark surface transportation bill, called TEA-21. While TEA-21 provides some flexibility in the use of the Highway Trust Fund to enable States to address some of these concerns, it is primarily focused on solving transportation problems by building or modifying roads, including road overpasses and underpasses, as it should be. However, in many situations, this highway-rail conflict can not, or should not, be fixed by cutting off or modifying a roadway. The answer is often to relocate the rail line. I know of at least five such situations in my home State of Mississippi, so there must be many more in other States.

To address this need, I, along with Senator KERRY, today introduce the Community Rail Line Relocation Assistance Act of 2001. The bill would authorize the Secretary of Transportation to provide grants to States or communities to pay for the costs of relocating a rail line where this solution makes the most sense. In those cases where the best solution is to build a railroad tunnel, underpass, or overpass, or even reroute the rail line around the downtown area, this bill will enable these cities and towns to afford to undertake such a significant infrastructure project.

Our bill would authorize grants to fund rail line relocation projects that: (1) mitigate the adverse effects of rail traffic on safety, motor vehicle traffic flow, or economic development; (2) involve a lateral or vertical relocation of the rail line in lieu of the closing of a grade crossing or the relocation of a road; and (3) provide at least as much benefit over the economic life of the project as the cost of the project. The DOT would fund 90 percent of the cost of these rail line relocation projects out of the general fund of the Treasury. The State or local government would be required to pay the remaining 10 percent, but would be allowed to cover this cost through appropriate in-kind contributions or dedicated private contributions.

In awarding these grants, the Secretary of Transportation would have to consider: (1) the ability of the State or community to fund the project without Federal assistance; (2) the equitable treatment of various regions of the country; (3) that at least 50 percent of the available funding be spent on projects costing less than $50 million; and (4) that not more than 25 percent of the available funding may be spent on any single project. The bill would authorize $250 million in grants during the first year, and $500 million over each of the following five years.

I understand that some may ask "why don't the railroads pay for these relocation costs?" As I noted earlier, the railroad has the right of way and has no legal obligation to move. However, I know the railroads to be concerned about maintaining good relations with the communities they serve and pass through. They want to cooperate in solving this problem. That is why the Association of American Railroads and the Short Line and Regional Railroad Association support this bill. The bill is also supported by the Railway Progress Institute and the National Railroad Construction and Maintenance Association. This proposal has been enthusiastically received by several State and local government associations, and I hope to have their endorsements of the bill soon. I ask my Senate colleagues to review the needs of their own States and support this bill and I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"(3) meets the costs-benefits requirement set forth in subsection (c).

"(c) COSTS-BENEFITS REQUIREMENT.—A grant may be awarded under this section for a project for the relocation of a rail line only if the benefits of the project for the period equal to the estimated economic life of the relocated rail line exceed the costs of the project for that period, as determined by the Secretary considering the following factors:

"(1) The effects of the rail line and the rail traffic on motor vehicle and pedestrian traffic, safety, and area commerce if the rail line were not so relocated.

"(2) The effects of the rail line, relocated as proposed, on motor vehicle and pedestrian traffic, safety, and area commerce.

"(3) The effects of the rail line, relocated as proposed, on the freight and passenger rail operations on the rail line.

"(d) CONSIDERATIONS FOR APPROVAL OF GRANT APPLICATIONS.—In addition to considering the relationship of benefits to costs in determining whether to award a grant to an eligible State under this section, the Secretary shall consider the following factors:

"(1) The capability of the State to fund the rail line relocation project without Federal grant funding.

"(2) The requirement and limitation relating to allocation of grant funds provided in subsection (e).

"(3) Equitable treatment of the various regions of the United States.

"(e) ALLOCATION REQUIREMENTS.—

"(1) PROJECTS UNDER $20,000,000.—At least 50 percent of all grant funds awarded under this section out of funds appropriated for a fiscal year shall be provided for rail line relocation projects that have an estimated project cost of less than $20,000,000 each.

"(B) A contribution of the services of employees of the State, calculated on the basis of costs incurred by the State for the pay and benefits of the employees, but excluding overhead and general administrative costs.

"(C) A payment of any costs that were incurred for the project before the filing of an application for a grant for the project under this section, and any in-kind contributions that were made for the project before the filing of the application, if and to the extent that the costs were incurred or in-kind contributions were made, as the case may be, to comply with a provision of a statute required to be satisfied in order to carry out the project.

"(4) COSTS NOT SHARED.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—For the purposes of subsection (f) and this subsection, the shared costs of a project in a municipality do not include any cost that is defrayed with any funds or in-kind contribution that a source other than the municipality makes available for the use of the municipality without imposing at least one of the following conditions:

"(i) The condition that the municipality use the funds or contribution only for the project.

"(ii) The condition that the availability of the funds or contribution to the municipality is contingent on the execution of the project.

"(B) DETERMINATIONS OF THE SECRETARY.—The Secretary shall determine the amount of the costs, if any, that are not shared costs under this paragraph and the total amount of the shared costs. A determination of the Secretary shall be final.

"(h) MULTISTATE AGREEMENTS TO COMBINE AMOUNTS.—Two or more States (not including political subdivisions of States) may, pursuant to an agreement entered into by the States, combine any part of the amounts provided through grants for a project under this section if—

"(1) the project will benefit each of the States entering into the agreement; and

"(2) the agreement is not a violation of a law of any such State.

"(i) REGULATIONS.—The Secretary shall prescribe regulations for carrying out this section.

By Mrs. FEINSTEIN:

S. 949. A bill for the relief of Zhenfu Ge; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mrs. FEINSTEIN. Mr. President, I am pleased to offer today, legislation to provide lawful permanent residence status to Zhenfu Ge. Mrs. Ge is the grandmother of two U.S. citizen children who face the devastation of being separated from their grandmother after losing their mother just last month.

Mrs. Ge came to the United States in 1998 to help care for her two grandchildren while her U.S. citizen daughter Yanyu Wang and her son-in-law John Marks worked. Shortly afterwards, Mrs. Ge's daughter filed an immigration petition on her behalf. She was scheduled for an April 26 Immigration and Naturalization Service, INS, interview, which is the last step in the green card process. The family anticipated that the interview would result in Mrs. Ge's gaining a green card.

In a tragic turn of events, Mrs. Ge's daughter was diagnosed with a rare and deadly form of lymphoma and given only 7 months to live. As Mrs. Wang's health quickly declined, she asked her mother to care for her 3-year-old daughter and 12-year-old son after her death. Mrs. Ge promised her daughter she would care for her grandchildren and quickly became the most active maternal figure in their lives.

On April 15 of this year, 11 days before Mrs. Ge's scheduled INS interview, her daughter died. Because current law does not allow Mrs. Ge to adjust her status without her daughter, Mrs. Ge now faces deportation.

This family has certainly felt the pain of a significant tragedy. With the death of Yanyu Wang, her family must begin to rebuild their lives and face a future without their loved one. Losing a grandmother to deportation will only further the grief and compromise the emotional health of her two young grandchildren, who are still mourning the loss of their mother. According to her son-in-law, John Mark, Mrs. Ge "represents continuity and a tie to their mother for our children, and her presence will allow me to continue to successfully support my family."

Mrs. Ge has done everything she could to become a permanent resident of this country. But for the tragedy of her daughter's untimely death, she likely would have attained that status.

I hope my colleagues will support this private legislation so that we can help Mrs. Ge, her grandchildren, and son-in-law begin to rebuild their lives in the wake of their family tragedy and allow Mrs. Ge to keep the promise she made to her daughter.

I ask for unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD. I also ask unanimous consent that the letter from Mr. Marks be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 949

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. PERMANENT RESIDENT STATUS FOR ZHENGFU GE.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Notwithstanding subsections (a) and (b) of section 201 of the Immigration and Nationality Act, Zhenfu Ge shall be eligible for issuance of an immigrant visa or for adjustment of status to that of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence upon filing an application for issuance of an immigrant visa under section 204 of such Act or for adjustment of status to lawful permanent resident.

(b) ADJUSTMENT OF STATUS.—If Zhengfu Ge enters the United States before the filing deadline specified in subsection (c), she shall be considered to have entered and remained lawfully and shall, if otherwise eligible, be eligible for adjustment of status under section 245 of the Immigration and Nationality Act as of the date of enactment of this Act.

(c) DEADLINE FOR APPLICATION AND PAYMENT OF FEES.—Subsections (a) and (b) shall apply only if the application for issuance of an immigrant visa or the application for adjustment of status are filed with appropriate fees within 2 years after the date of enactment of this Act.

(d) REDUCTION OF IMMIGRANT VISA NUMBER.—Upon the granting of an immigrant visa or permanent residence to Zhenfu Ge, the Secretary of State shall instruct the proper officer to reduce by one, during the current or next following fiscal year, the total number of immigrant visas that are made available to natives of the country of the alien's birth under section 203(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act or, if applicable, the total number of immigrant visas that are made available to natives of the country of the alien's birth under section 202(e) of such Act.

SAUSALITO, CA,

April 19, 2001.

Hon. DIANNE FEINSTEIN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR FEINSTEIN: I write to appeal for your help in an exceptional immigration case regarding my mother-in-law, Zhenfu Ge (United States Immigration & Naturalization Service reference #A78192014.)

Mrs. Ge came to the United States from her native Shanghai, China in 1998 after our daughter was born. The purpose of her immigration was to care for our infant and for our nine-year-old son to enable my wife and me to work. I have lived in California most of my life and I work for Kaiser Permanente in San Rafael; my wife, Yanyu Wang, was a research scientist for Onyx Pharmaceuticals in Richmond, and a naturalized citizen of the United States.

We had applied for naturalization for Mrs. Ge to allow her to remain in the United States to care for her grandchildren indefi-nately. We had every expectation that the INS hearing set for April 26 (see correspondence enclosed) would result in the successful completion of her application.

My wife had learned that she was suffering from lymphoma in 1999. Unfortunately, despite every possible medical intervention, she died on April 15, eleven days before her mother's hearing for naturalization. We are advised by our attorney that absent her daughter, Mrs. Ge's case will be dismissed out-of-hand, and she will be forced to return to China.

I hope you will agree that Mrs. Ge's presence in our family is even more important following the death of my wife. She is the only maternal figure for our children, she represents continuity and a tie to their mother for our children, and her presence will allow me to continue to successfully support my family notwithstanding the reduction of our income to a single salary.

Before she died, my wife implored her mother to do everything possible to remain in the United States to ensure that our children would be raised with her care and love. I ask for your help in enabling this to happen.

Thank you for your consideration in this matter.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN MARK.

By Mr. SMITH of New Hampshire
(for himself and Mr. REID):

S. 950. A bill to amend the Clean Air Act to address problems concerning methyl tertiary butyl ether, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

Mr. SMITH of New Hampshire. Mr. President, by now everyone knows of the damage that the gasoline additive, MTBE, has done to our nation's drinking water supply, including in the state of New Hampshire. MTBE has been a component of our fuel supply for two decades. In 1990, the Clean Air Act was amended to include a clean gasoline program. That program mandated the use of an oxygenate in our fuel, MTBE was one of two options to be used. The problem with MTBE is its ability to migrate through the ground very quickly and into the water table. Several states have had gasoline leaks or spills lead to the closure of wells because of MTBE. MTBE is not a proven carcinogen, but its smell and taste does render water unusable. Many homes in New Hampshire and across the nation have lost use of their water supply because of MTBE contamination.

Today I am introducing a bill with my friend Senator REID, who is the Ranking Member on the committee that I chair, the Environment & Public Works Committee. This bill addresses the problems associated with MTBE, but will not reduce any environmental benefits of the Clean Air program. Briefly, this bill will: Authorize $400 million out of the Leaking Underground Storage Tank Fund (LUST Fund) to help the states clean up MTBE contamination, address the integrity of Underground Storage Tanks and the program; Ban MTBE four years after enactment of this bill; Allow Governors to waive the gasoline oxygenate requirement of the Clean Air Act; Preserve environmental benefits on air toxics, and; Provide funds to help transition from MTBE to other clean, safe fuels.

The funding for cleanup and transition is provided out of a sense of fairness. Since a Federal mandate caused the pollution, it would be irresponsible for the Federal Government not to bear some of the financial burden associated with the clean up and the transition to a less destructive alternative fuel.

This is a very complex issue that the Environment and Public Works Committee has struggled with for months. It has always been my intent to craft a solution that was direct and balanced. There are many competing interests and a number of solutions have been offered. Most of the competing interests are based on regional differences and preferences.

Some prefer a simple ban of MTBE, this approach would make gas dramatically more expensive and more dirty. Some would like a stand alone mandate of Ethanol, that too has many problems associated with it. Ethanol would bring with it both cost and smog concerns, particularly in states like New Hampshire. Simply eliminating the RFG mandate does not work either. Under this scenario, MTBE would continue to be used and wells would continue to be contaminated.

I am also very pleased that this bill is consistent with the President's National Energy Policy because it will reduce the intra-regional patchwork of what are known as "boutique" fuels. This bill will allow for the use of one fuel blend to meet RFG requirement in many regions that currently require multiple boutique fuels. This will ease the burden on refineries and fuel supply, which in turn will reduce the risk of increased gas prices for the consumer. The fuel suppliers recognize this benefit and I am very pleased that this bill has the support of the American Petroleum Institute. While they have raised some minor technical concerns that I am committed to addressing prior to passage, I am pleased to have their support.

I believe that this bill provides for a workable solution to both our MTBE problem as well as addressing the "boutique" fuels problems in this country. We will clean up our nation's drinking water and preserve the environmental benefits of RFG without undue added cost to the consumers. I am convinced this is the right approach.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with the Senator from New Hampshire, the Chairman of the Environment and Public Works Committee, in introducing legislation to address the water resource problems that have been caused in Lake Tahoe and around the country by MTBE contamination.

As my colleagues may know, the oxygenate requirement that Congress included in the 1990 Clean Air Act Amendments for certain nonattainment areas was met by most fuel providers and refiners with significantly increased production of MTBE. While this additive has proven beneficial in meeting air quality goals and reducing toxic air pollution, its enhanced production and usage has led to major drinking and surface water contamination, largely because of leaking underground storage tanks, spills and watercraft releases.

Our bill seeks to deal with the MTBE problem and prevent such unintended consequences from occurring again, while still protecting air and water quality. This measure embodies several of the major recommendations of the EPA's Blue Ribbon Panel on Oxygenates in Gasoline.

We are proposing to significantly enhance state authority and resources to deal with remediation of MTBE releases from leaking underground storage tanks, and to improve compliance and prevent additional releases at these sources. Four years after enactment, MTBE would be banned from the fuel supply. The bill would amend the Clean Air Act to ensure that additives added to the fuel supply in the future undergo regular testing and review of public health and water quality impacts.

Our legislation allows Governors to waive out of the oxygenate requirement imposed by the Act's reformulated gasoline, RFG provisions and, for the RFG areas in those states, refiners and fuel providers would have to ensure that there would be continued over-compliance with toxics reductions performance standards based on regional averages. In recognition of the industry investments made to comply with the oxygenate requirement, the bill authorizes grants to American companies making MTBE for domestic consumption in RFG areas if they opt to convert to production of replacement additives that do not degrade water quality, as well as continuing to improve public health and air quality. Finally, the bill allows the EPA to improve on its mobile source toxics rule and afford better protection to more sensitive and exposed populations from these harmful substances.

This is a sensible bill that prevents backsliding on air quality and is designed to improve water resource protection. I am hopeful that the Committee and Congress will be able to act swiftly to resolve the MTBE problems facing so many communities across the nation and in Nevada.

By Ms. SNOWE (for herself, Mr. KERRY, Mr. MCCAIN, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. BREAUX, Mr. LOTT, Mr. MURKOWSKI, and Mr. DEWINE):

S. 951. A bill to authorize appropriations for the Coast Guard, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. President, today I am pleased to introduce the Coast Guard Authorization Act of 2001.

The Coast Guard provides many critical services for our nation. Dedicated Coast Guard personnel save an average of more than 5,000 lives, $2.5 billion in property, and assist more than 100,000 mariners in distress. Through boater safety programs and maintenance of an extensive network of aids to navigation, the Coast Guard protects thousands of other people engaged in coastwise trade, commercial fishing activities, and recreational boating.

The Coast Guard enforces Federal laws and treaties related to the high seas and U.S. waters. This includes marine resource protection and pollution control. As one of the five armed forces, the Coast Guard provides a critical component of the nation's defense strategy. The Coast Guard has joined with the Navy under the National Fleet Policy Statement to integrate their complementary offshore assets and enhance our national defense.

The Coast Guard Authorization Act of 1998 was enacted on November 13, 1992 and authorized the Coast Guard through Fiscal Year 1999. Last year, I spend a considerable amount of time trying to enact meaningful legislation to reauthorize the Coast Guard. To that end, the Commerce Committee and the Senate unanimously passed the Coast Guard Authorization Act of 2000 in July of 2000. Unfortunately, final enactment of the bill was derailed by one provision that had nothing to do with the Coast Guard itself and was outside the jurisdiction of the Subcommittee on Oceans and Fisheries. As a result, the dedicated and hard-working men and women in uniform were penalized.

The Coast Guard deserves more. By introducing the Coast Guard bill today, I intend to give them my full support, and I hope my colleagues will work with me to provide the Coast Guard with the support that they have so clearly earned.

For the second year in a row, the Coast Guard has announced that it will reduce routine non-emergency operations by at least 10 percent. The Administration's Budget request for fiscal year 2002 would leave the Coast Guard $250 million short in critical operating funds. This shortfall will necessitate operations cutbacks to include decommissioning ships and aircraft. The budget authorized in this bill would restore those funding shortfalls and prevent the need for operational cutbacks.

The bill my colleagues and I introduce today authorizes funding and personnel levels for the Coast Guard in fiscal years 2000 through 2002. The bill authorizes funding for FY 2002 at $5.2 billion. This represents a 9.3 percent increase over the levels contained in last year's Senate-passed bill authorization and a 14 percent increase over the funds appropriated for fiscal year 2001. The bill also contains several provisions to provide greater flexibility on personnel management matters and critical readiness concerns within the Coast Guard.

The Coast Guard bill contains a new initiative on fishing vessel safety training. Commercial fishing is one of the most dangerous professions in the United States. Over the last three years, over two hundred fishermen have died at sea and even more fishing vessels have been lost. Last year, the Maine fleet tragically lost ten fishermen. This bill authorizes the Coast Guard to work with and support local organizations that promote or provide fishing vessel safety training. Under this proposal, active duty Coast Guard personnel, Coast Guard Reserve, and members of the Coast Guard Auxiliary could serve as instructors for training and safety courses; assist in the development of curricula; and participate in relevant advisory panels. This new initiative allows discretionary participation by the agency on a not-to-interfere basis with other Congressionally mandated missions.

A major part of the Coast Guard's law enforcement mission remains interdicting illegal narcotics at sea. In 2000, the Coast Guard seized 56 vessels and arrested 201 suspects transporting illegal narcotics headed for our shores. The U.S. Coast Guard set a cocaine seizure record for the second consecutive year by stopping 132,920 pounds of cocaine from reaching American streets, playgrounds, and schools. The Coast Guard also seized 50,463 pounds of marijuana products, including hashish and hashish oil. At $4.4 billion, the street value of the drugs seized last year nearly matched the entire Coast Guard budget.

In 2000, the Coast Guard also introduced the highly successful Operation New Frontier force package, including specially armed helicopters, over-the-horizon pursuit boats, and the use of non-lethal tools to stop go-fast type smuggling boats. Operation New Frontier forces documented an unprecedented 100 percent success rate by seizing all six of the go-fast trafficking boats detected.

This bill provides funding to maintain many of the new drug interdiction initiatives of the past few years. The Coast Guard has proven time and again its ability to efficiently stem the tide of drugs entering our nation through water routes.

The Coast Guard is the lead Federal agency for preventing and responding to major pollution incidents in the coastal zone. It responds to more than 17,000 pollution incidents in the average year. The recent oil spill in the fragile Galapagos Islands is an example where our investment in the Coast Guard reaped international rewards. Within 24 hours of the spill, a team of Coast Guard oil spill professionals were on transport aircraft en route to the spill scene with cleanup equipment. Their presence limited the ecological damage of this potentially horrific environmental tragedy.

One provision that deserves particular mention relates to icebreaking services. The FY 2000 budget request included a proposal to decommission 11 WYTL-class harbor tugs. These tugs provide vital icebreaking services throughout the Great Lakes and northeastern states, including my home state of Maine. While I understand that the age of this vessel class may require some action by the agency, it would be premature to decommission these vessels before the Coast Guard has identified a means to assure their domestic icebreaking mission requirements are fulfilled. The Coast Guard has identified seven waterways within Maine that would suffer a meaningful degradation of service if these tugs were decommissioned. These waterways provide transport routes for oil tankers, commercial fishing vessels, and cargo ships. The costs would be excessive to the local communities should that means of transport be cut off. As we have seen during recent winters, ready access to home heating fuel in Maine and elsewhere in the Northeast is a necessity. As such, the bill I am introducing today includes a measure that would prevent the Coast Guard from removing these tugs from service unless adequate replacement assets are in place.

Finally, we must recognize that the United States Coast Guard is a force conducting 21st century operations with 20th century technology. Of the 39 worldwide naval fleets, the United States Coast Guard has the 37th oldest fleet of ships and aircraft. This year the Coast Guard will embark on a major recapitalization for the ships and aircraft designed to operate more than 50 miles offshore. The Integrated Deepwater System acquisition program is critical to the future viability of the Coast Guard. I wholeheartedly support this initiative and the "system-of-systems" procurement strategy the Coast Guard has proposed. This bill authorized funding for the first year of this critical long-term recapitalization program.

This is a good bill that enjoys bipartisan support on the Commerce Committee. I am pleased that so many of my colleagues have joined me in sponsoring this bill. I know that my co-sponsors, Senators KERRY, MCCAIN, HOLLINGS, BREAUX, LOTT, MURKOWSKI, and DEWINE, also look forward to moving the bill to the Senate floor at the earliest opportunity.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

“(2) The Secretary may waive the service obligated under subsection (f) of a member who is not physically qualified for appointment and who is determined to be unqualified for service as an enlisted member of the Coast Guard Reserve due to a physical or

TITLE VI—JONES ACT WAIVERS

SEC. 601. REPEAL OF SPECIAL AUTHORITY TO REVOKE ENDORSEMENTS.

Section 503 of the Coast Guard Authorization Act of 1998 (46 U.S.C. 12106 note) is repealed.

Mr. MCCAIN. Mr. President, I rise in support of the Coast Guard Authorization Act of 2001. Charged with maintaining our national defense and the safety of our citizens, the Coast Guard is a multi-mission agency. The Coast Guard is a branch of the U.S. Armed Forces, but it is also a unique instrument of national security, responsible for search and rescue services and maritime law enforcement. Daily operations include drug interdiction, environmental protection, marine inspection, licensing, port safety and security, aids to navigation, waterways management, and boating safety.

Recently the Coast Guard has been forced to reduce its services and cut its operations as a result of funding shortfalls. Earlier this year, for the second year in a row, the Coast Guard reduced its non-emergency operations by over 10 percent due to a shortfall in operating appropriations. Mr. President, the Coast Guard and the American people deserve better, and the bill I am proud to cosponsor today authorizes funding at levels which would restore the Coast Guard to the full operational level. Additionally, the bill provides necessary funding for cutter and aircraft maintenance including the elimination of the existing spare parts shortage.

This bill provides the funding necessary to maintain the level of service and the quality of performance that the United States has come to expect from the Coast Guard. I commend the men and women of the Coast Guard for their honorable and courageous service to this country. The bill authorizes $4.63 billion in FY 2000, $4.83 billion in 2001, and $5.22 billion in FY 2002.

One critical goal of this bill is to provide parity with the Department of Defense on certain personnel matters. We should ensure that the men and women serving in the Coast Guard are not adversely affected because the Coast Guard does not fall under the DOD umbrella. This bill provides parity with DOD for military pay and housing allowance increases, Coast Guard membership on the USO Board of Governors, and compensation for isolated duty.

In today's strong economy, the Armed Services are seeing an exodus of experienced officers and enlisted personnel. Additional funding in this bill provides for recruiting and retention initiatives, to ensure that the Coast Guard retains the most qualified young Americans. In addition, it addresses the current shortage of qualified pilots and authorizes the Coast Guard to send more students to flight school. New programs will offer financial assistance to bring college students into the Service and bring retired officers back on active duty to fill temporary experience gaps.

The Coast Guard is the lead federal agency in maritime drug interdiction. Therefore, they are often our nation's first line of defense in the war on drugs. This bill authorizes the Coast Guard to acquire and operate up to seven ex-Navy patrol boats, thereby expanding the Coast Guard's critical presence in the Caribbean, a major drug trafficking area. With the vast majority of the drugs smuggled into the United States on the water, the Coast Guard must remain well equipped to prevent drugs from reaching our schools and streets. I was gratified to learn that just a few weeks ago, the Coast Guard made the largest single maritime cocaine seizure in history; more than 13 tons of illegal drugs bound for U.S. streets are instead bound for an incinerator.

Environmental protection, including oil-spill cleanup, is an invaluable service provided by the Coast Guard. Under current law, the Coast Guard has access to a permanent annual appropriation of $50 million, distributed by the Oil Spill Liability Trust Fund, to carry out emergency oil spill response needs. Over the past few years, the fund has spent an average of $42 to $50 million per year, without the occurrence of a major oil spill. Clearly these funds would not be adequate to respond to a large spill. For instance, a spill the size of the Exxon Valdez could easily deplete the annual appropriated funds in two to three weeks. This bill authorizes the Coast Guard to borrow up to an additional $100 million, per incident, from the Oil Spill Liability Trust Fund, for emergency spill responses. In such cases, it also requires the Coast Guard to notify Congress of amounts borrowed within thirty days and repay such amounts once payment is collected from the responsible party.

The 1999 President's Interagency Task Force on U.S. Coast Guard Roles and Missions reported "The Coast Guard provides the United States a broad spectrum of vital services that will be increasingly important in the decades ahead." It further found that "the nation must take action soon to modernize and recapitalize Coast Guard forces, if the Service is to remain Semper Paratus—Always Ready." Mr. President, that modernization is just beginning and I am proud to support the Administration's request for $338 million in Fiscal Year 2002 to fund the Integrated Deepwater System project. The bill I am cosponsoring today authorizes full funding for the first year of this multi-year project to replace more than 115 old ships and 165 aircraft that will soon reach their service lives. I support the Coast Guard's groundbreaking procurement process that stresses life cycle cost efficiency and not just lowest procurement cost.

This bill represents a thorough set of improvements which will make the Coast Guard more effective, improve the quality of life of its personnel, and facilitate their daily operations. I would like to thank Senators SNOWE and KERRY for their bipartisan leadership on Coast Guard issues, as well as my fellow co-sponsors Senators HOLLINGS, BREAUX, LOTT, MURKOWSKI, and DEWINE for their longstanding support of the Coast Guard.

By Mr. GREGG (for himself, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. DEWINE, and Mr. BAYH):

S. 952. A bill to provide collective bargaining rights for public safety officers employed by States or their political subdivisions; to the Committee on Health, Education, Labor, and Pensions.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. President, today, I am pleased to be joined by Senators KENNEDY, DEWINE, and BAYH in introducing the Public Safety Employer-Employee Cooperation Act of 2001. This legislation would extend to firefighters and police officers the right to discuss workplace issues with their employers.

With the enactment of the Congressional Accountability Act, State and local government employees remain the only sizable segment of workers left in America who do not have the basic right to enter into collective bargaining agreements with their employers. While most States do provide some collective bargaining rights for their public employees, others do not.

The lack of collective bargaining rights is especially troublesome in the public safety arena. Firefighters and police officers take seriously their oath to protect the public safety, and as a result, they do not engage in work stoppages or slowdowns. The absence of collective bargaining denies these workers any opportunity to influence the decisions that affect their lives or livelihoods.

Studies have shown that communities which promote such cooperation enjoy much more effective and efficient delivery of emergency services. Such cooperation, however, is not possible in the 18 States that do not provide public safety employees with the fundamental right to bargain with their employers.

The legislation I am introducing today recognizes the unique situation and obligation of public safety officers. First, we create a special collective bargaining right outside the scope of other Federal labor law and specifically prohibit the use of strikes, work stoppages or other actions that could disrupt the delivery of services. Second, this legislation utilizes the procedures and expertise of the Federal Labor Relations Authority to help resolve disputes between public safety employers and employees. This bill simply requires that each State provide minimum collective bargaining rights to their public safety employees in whatever manner they choose. It outlines certain provisions that must be included in state laws, but leaves the major decisions to the state legislatures. States that already have the minimum collective bargaining protections as outlined in this legislation would be exempt from the Federal statute. And third, the bill specifically prohibits strikes, lockouts, sickouts, work slowdowns or any other job action which will disrupt the delivery of emergency services.

Labor-management partnerships, which are built upon bargaining relationships, result in improved public safety. Employer-employee cooperation contains the promise of saving the taxpayer money by enabling workers to give input as to the most efficient way to provide services. In fact, States that currently give firefighters the right to discuss workplace issues actually have lower fire department budgets than states without those laws.

The Public Safety Employer-Employee Cooperation act of 2001 will put firefighters and law enforcement officers on equal footing with other employees and provide them with the fundamental right to negotiate with employers over such basic issues as hours, wages, and workplace conditions.

I urge its adoption and ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 952

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Public Safety Employer-Employee Cooperation Act of 2001".

SEC. 2. DECLARATION OF PURPOSE AND POLICY.

The Congress declares that the following is the policy of the United States:

(1) Labor-management relationships and partnerships are based on trust, mutual respect, open communication, bilateral consensual problem solving, and shared accountability. Labor-management cooperation fully utilizes the strengths of both parties to best serve the interests of the public, operating as a team, to carry out the public safety mission in a quality work environment. In many public safety agencies it is the union that provides the institutional stability as elected leaders and appointees come and go.

(2) The Federal Government needs to encourage conciliation, mediation, and voluntary arbitration to aid and encourage employers and their employees to reach and maintain agreements concerning rates of pay, hours, and working conditions, and to make all reasonable efforts through negotiations to settle their differences by mutual agreement reached through collective bargaining or by such methods as may be provided for in any applicable agreement for the settlement of disputes.

(3) The absence of adequate cooperation between public safety employers and employees has implications for the security of employees and can affect interstate and intrastate commerce. The lack of such labor-management cooperation can detrimentally impact the upgrading of police and fire services of local communities, the health and well-being of public safety officers, and the morale of the fire and police departments. Additionally, these factors could have significant commercial repercussions. Moreover, providing minimal standards for collective bargaining negotiations in the public safety sector can prevent industrial strife between labor and management that interferes with the normal flow of commerce.

Any petition under this section shall be conducted in accordance with subsections (c) and (d) of section 7123 of title 5, United States Code, except that any final order of the Authority with respect to questions of fact or law shall be found to be conclusive unless the court determines that the Authority's decision was arbitrary and capricious.

(2) PRIVATE RIGHT OF ACTION.—Unless the Authority has filed a petition for enforcement as provided in paragraph (1), any party has the right to file suit in a State court of competent jurisdiction to enforce compliance with the regulations issued by the Authority pursuant to subsection (b), and to enforce compliance with any order issued by the Authority pursuant to this section. The right provided by this subsection to bring a suit to enforce compliance with any order issued by the Authority pursuant to this section shall terminate upon the filing of a petition seeking the same relief by the Authority.

SEC. 6. STRIKES AND LOCKOUTS PROHIBITED.

A public safety employer, officer, or labor organization may not engage in a lockout, sickout, work slowdown, or strike or engage in any other action that is designed to compel an employer, officer, or labor organization to agree to the terms of a proposed contract and that will measurably disrupt the delivery of emergency services, except that it shall not be a violation of this section for an employer, officer, or labor organization to refuse to provide services not required by the terms and conditions of an existing contract.

SEC. 7. EXISTING COLLECTIVE BARGAINING UNITS AND AGREEMENTS.

A certification, recognition, election-held, collective bargaining agreement or memorandum of understanding which has been issued, approved, or ratified by any public employee relations board or commission or by any State or political subdivision or its agents (management officials) in effect on the day before the date of enactment of this Act shall not be invalidated by the enactment of this Act.

SEC. 8. CONSTRUCTION AND COMPLIANCE.

(a) CONSTRUCTION.—Nothing in this Act shall be construed—

(1) to invalidate or limit the remedies, rights, and procedures of any law of any State or political subdivision of any State or jurisdiction that provides collective bargaining rights for public safety officers that are equal to or greater than the rights provided under this Act; or

(2) to prevent a State from prohibiting bargaining over issues which are traditional and customary management functions, except as provided in section 4(b)(3).

(b) COMPLIANCE.—No State shall preempt laws or ordinances of any of its political subdivisions if such laws provide collective bargaining rights for public safety officers that are equal to or greater than the rights provided under this Act.

SEC. 9. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am honored today to join my colleagues, Senators GREGG, DEWINE, and BAYH, to introduce the "Public Safety Employer-Employee Cooperation Act of 2001."

For more than 60 years, collective bargaining has enabled labor and management to work together to improve job conditions and increase productivity. Through collective bargaining, labor and management have led the way on many important improvements in today's workplace—especially with regard to health and pension benefits, paid holidays and sick leave, and workplace safety.

Collective bargaining in the public sector, once a controversial issue, is now widely accepted. It has been common since at least 1962, when President Kennedy signed an Executive Order granting these basic rights to federal employees. Congressional employees have had these rights since enactment of the Congressional Accountability Act almost a decade ago. It is long since time to give state and local government employees federal protection for the basic right to enter into collective bargaining agreements with their employers.

The act we are introducing today extends this protection to firefighters, police officers, paramedics and emergency medical technicians. The bill guarantees the fundamental rights necessary for collective bargaining—the right to form and join a union; the right to bargain over hours, wages and working conditions; the right to sign legally enforceable contracts; and the right to a resolution mechanism in the event of an impasse in negotiations. The bill also accomplishes its goals in a reasonable and moderate way.

The benefits of this bill are clear and compelling. It will lead to safer working conditions for public safety officers. These valued public employees serve in some of the country's most dangerous, strenuous and stressful jobs. Every year, more than 80,000 police officers and 75,000 firefighters are injured on the job. An average of 160 police officers and nearly 100 firefighters die in the line of duty each year. Because these men and women serve on the front lines in providing firefighting services, law enforcement services, and emergency medical services, they know what it takes to create safer working conditions. They deserve the benefit of collective bargaining to give them a voice in decisions that can literally make a life-and-death difference on the job.

Our bill will also save money for states and local communities. Experience has shown that when public safety officers can discuss workplace conditions with management, partnerships and cooperation develop and lead to improved labor-management relations and better, more cost-effective services. A study by the International Association of Fire Fighters shows that states and municipalities that give firefighters the right to discuss workplace issues have lower fire department budgets than states without such laws. When workers who actually do the job are able to provide advice on their work conditions, there are fewer injuries, better morale, better information on new technologies, and more efficient ways to provide the services.

It is a matter of basic fairness to give these courageous men and women the same rights that have long been enjoyed by other workers. They put their lives on the line to protect us every day. They deserve to have an effective voice on the job, and improvements in their work conditions will benefit their entire community.

I urge my colleagues to support this important measure.

By Mr. MCCONNELL (for himself, Mr. SCHUMER, Mr. TORRICELLI, Mr. BROWNBACK, Mr. ALLARD, Mr. AKAKA, Mr. ALLEN, Mr. BAYH, Mr. BENNETT, Mrs. BOXER, Mr. BUNNING, Mr. BREAUX, Mr. BURNS, Ms. CANTWELL, Mr. CAMPBELL, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. CLELAND, Ms. COLLINS, Mrs. CLINTON, Mr. CRAIG, Mr. CONRAD, Mr. CRAPO, Mr. CORZINE, Mr. DEWINE, Mr. DASCHLE, Mr. DOMENICI, Mr. DAYTON, Mr. ENSIGN, Mr. DURBIN, Mr. ENZI, Mr. EDWARDS, Mr. FRIST, Mr. GRAHAM, Mr. GRAMM, Mr. INOUE, Mr. GREGG, Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. HATCH, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. HELMS, Mr. KERRY, Mrs. HUTCHISON, Mr. KOHL, Mr. JEFFORDS, Ms. LANDRIEU, Mr. LOTT, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. LUGAR, Ms. MIKULSKI, Mr. NELSON of Nebraska, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mr. NELSON of Florida, Mr. ROBERTS, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Mr. SANTORUM, Mr. WELLSTONE, Mr. SESSIONS, Mr. SHELBY, Mr. SMITH of New Hampshire, Mr. SMITH of Oregon,

S. 953. A bill to establish a Blue Ribbon Study Panel and an Election Administration Commission to study voting procedures and election administration, to provide grants to modernize voting procedures and election administration, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. President, when election reform emerged on the nation's agenda last winter, as chairman of the Senate Rules Committee, the committee of jurisdiction over election law, I resolved to keep the issue from getting bogged down in the partisan morass. The furor and fervor surround the last election has finally given way to a constructive bipartisan consensus. Today it is a distinct pleasure to join with Senators SCHUMER, TORRICELLI, and BROWNBACK in advancing bipartisan legislation to restore faith in American elections.

Even more remarkable is the support in the endeavor of two reform groups with whom I have been engaged over the years in something less than a mutual admiration society, to say the least: Common Cause and the League of Women Voters. Ours is perhaps the most curious alliance since Bob Dole teamed up with Britney Spears to push Pepsi. And only slightly less jarring.

Nearly as discombobulating was opening the New York Times editorial page and seeing my name in print in the lead editorial applauding the McConnell/Schumer/Torricelli/Brownback bill. My wife, the Secretary of Labor, subsequently performed the Heimlich maneuver, lest I choke on the New York Times' praise. No doubt the editorial writer experienced similar bewilderment, as Darth Vader suddenly became Luke Skywalker overnight.

As this alliance indicates, election reform must transcend partisanship and result in real and lasting achievement by ensuring what I call, the three A's of election reform: Accuracy, Access and Accountability. This is the essence of this bill.

Our bill will establish, for the first time in our Nation's history, a permanent Election Administration Commission. This new permanent commission will bring focused expertise to bear on the administration of elections, and, importantly, award matching grants to States and localities to improve the accuracy and integrity of our election system.

Accuracy. The last election produced outcries over inaccurate voter rolls where some cities actually had more registered voters than the voting age population. And, of course, we've all heard the stories of both pets and dead people being registered to vote, and, in some instances, actually voting.

This legislation will require accurate voter rolls to ensure that those who vote are legally entitled to do so, and do so only once.

Access. This legislation also seeks to ensure that never again will our men and women in uniform be denied the opportunity to vote. The bill will merge the Department of Defense's Office of Voting Assistance into the new permanent commission. Moreover, the bill will increase the ability of disabled voters to both register and vote.

Accountability. The new Election Administration Commission will dramatically increase accountability by awarding grants only to those states and localities who ensure accurate and accessible voting.

Again, I applaud Senators SCHUMER, TORRICELLI, AND BROWNBACK for their principled and diligent work on this effort over the past six months. I believe this bill is the first, best step toward meaningful election reform.

By Mr. KENNEDY (for himself, Mr. GRAHAM, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. KERRY, Mr. WELLSTONE, Mr. DODD, Mr. INOUE, Mr. DURBIN, Mr. FEINGOLD, and Mr. AKAKA):

S. 955. A bill to amend the Immigration and Nationality Act to modify restrictions added by the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigration Responsibility Act of 1996; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am honored to join my colleagues, Senators GRAHAM, LEAHY, KERRY, WELLSTONE, DODD, INOUE, AKAKA, FEINGOLD, and DURBIN in introducing the Immigrant Fairness Restoration Act. This legislation will restore the balance to our immigration laws that was lost when Congress amended the immigration laws in 1996.

The changes made in 1996 went too far. They have had harsh consequences that punish families and violate individual liberty, fairness and due process. Families are being torn apart. Persons who present no danger to their communities have been left to languish in INS detention. Individuals are being summarily deported from the United States, to countries they no longer remember, separated from all that they know and love.

The bill we are introducing will undo many of these harsh consequences. It will eliminate the retroactive application of the 1996 changes. Permanent residents who committed offenses long before the enactment of the 1996 laws should be able to apply for the relief from removal under the law as it existed when the offense was committed.

Current immigration laws too often punish permanent residents out of all proportion to their crimes. Relatively minor offenses are turned into aggravated felonies. Permanent residents who did not have criminal convictions or serve prison sentences are blocked from all relief from deportation.

Our proposal restores the discretion that immigration judges previously had and responsibly exercised to evaluate cases on an individual basis and grant relief from deportation to deserving persons. Currently, immigration judges are precluded from granting such relief to many permanent residents, regardless of the circumstances or equities in the cases. As a result of the 1996 laws, the judges' hands are tied, even in the most compelling cases. This legislation will allow immigration judges to return to their proper role.

Our bill will also end mandatory detention. The Attorney General will have the authority to release from detention persons who do not pose a danger to the community and are not a flight risk. Detention is an extraordinary power that should only be used in extraordinary circumstances. A judge should have the discretion to release from detention persons who are not a danger to the community and who do not pose a flight risk.

Clearly, dangerous criminals should be detained and deported. But indefinite detention must end. No public purpose is served by wasting valuable resources detaining non-dangerous individuals, many of whom have lived in this country with their families for many years, established strong ties to their communities, paid taxes, and contributed in other ways to the fabric of our Nation.

The 1996 laws also stripped the Federal courts of any authority to review the decisions of the INS and the immigration courts. Under present law, harsh determinations are often made at the unreviewable discretion of INS officers. Fundamental decisions are made on the basis of a brief review of a few pages in a file, or a perfunctory administrative hearing, without judicial review. Our proposal will restore such review. Immigrants deserve their day in court.

Americans are proud of our heritage and history as a nation of immigrants. It is long past time for Congress to correct the laws enacted in 1996.

Many heart-wrenching stories could be cited about the "nightmares" created by the 1996 laws and the people caught by its provisions.

Consider the case of Carlos Garcia, who fled from his native land of El Salvador in 1978 during the civil war. Upon arriving in the United States, he became fluent in English and attended a local community college, and in 1982, he became a permanent resident. All of his family live in this country, including his U.S. citizen parents.

In 1993, he pleaded guilty to taking $200 from a department store where he worked. He was sentenced to two years of probation, with a suspended jail sentence, and he completed his probation early. Apart from this single offense, he has no criminal history. For years, he has worked as a caterer, holding a security clearance, since his employer handled functions in Congress, the State Department and White House. He regularly attends church and participates in a bone marrow transplant program to help children.

In 1998, the INS placed Carlos in removal proceedings after he returned from a four-day vacation cruise. Because the 1996 laws made his crime an aggravated felony, the immigration judge no longer had discretion to consider evidence of his positive contributions to his community, his family ties, or the potential hardship that severing those ties may cause.

Or consider the case of Claudette Etienne, who fled from Haiti at the age of 23, and was a legal resident of the United States for 20 years. She had two young U.S. citizen children and lived with her husband in Miami. One day, during an argument, Claudette threatened her husband with a broken bottle, and was sentenced to a year of probation. In June 1999, she was found guilty of selling a small amount of cocaine and was sentenced to another year of probation. When she was summoned to see her probation officer in February 2000, INS officers arrested her and placed her in deportation proceedings under the 1996 immigration laws. She was imprisoned in an INS detention center for the next seven months, and in September was taken by U.S. Marshals and put on a flight to Haiti.

Upon arriving in Haiti, the police immediately jailed her in a cell that was pitch black. The air was thick with the stench of human sweat and waste, and the temperature reached 105 degrees. Claudette had to rely on the compassion of prisoners and guards for food, since the jail provided none. During her imprisonment in Haiti, she became sick with fever, stomach pains, diarrhea, and constant vomiting from drinking tap water. She died in the jail a few days later.

Surely, Congress cannot ignore such abuses. Even many proponents of the 1996 laws now admit that these changes went too far and need to be corrected as soon as possible. The Immigrant Fairness Restoration Act will help to protect families, assure fairness and due process, and restore the integrity of our immigration laws, and I urge all my colleagues to support it.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues, Senators KENNEDY, DODD, DURBIN, INOUE, KERRY, LEAHY, AKAKA, and WELLSTONE to introduce the Immigrant Fairness Restoration Act of 2001. This legislation brings balance back to the legal system. It rights some of the wrongs of the 1996 immigration law. It restores fairness and justice to everyone in our country.

As it stands today, the immigration laws violate those core American principles.

The original aim of the 1996 immigration bill was to control illegal immigration. In practice, the law hurts legal permanent residents and others who entered, or wanted to enter, the United States legally.

The 1996 laws, Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act, IIRAIRA, and Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act, AEDPA, mandated deportation of legal aliens for relatively insignificant crimes. For the most part, these are crimes for which they have already served their punishment. They have restricted access to legal counsel and virtually no recourse in the courts.

This violates the tradition of our country. It also violates the essence of our legal system. Our constitution demands that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law. This fundamental right applies to all persons, regardless of their paperwork or where they were born.

Our legal system should be about granting people their day at court, to provide a second chance, to keep the rules of the game fair.

When we think about fairness, or lack of fairness, we should think about personal stories. John Gaul, formerly from Tampa, FL, has been punished twice for his mistakes. John was adopted from Thailand by his U.S. citizen parents when he was 4 years old. As a teenager, he was convicted of car theft and credit card fraud, two nonviolent offenses for which he served 20 months in jail. John does not remember Thailand. He does not speak Thai, nor does he know of relatives there. None of that mattered. John was deported to Thailand and may never be allowed to return to his parents in the United States.

Was it fair to threaten Carolina Murry of Neptune Beach with deportation for voting, even though she never knew she was not a U.S. citizen? Carolina's father told her that she had become a U.S. citizen shortly after she moved with him from the Dominican Republic at the age of 3. Only in 1998, when she applied for a passport, did she learn that in fact she was not. In the process of becoming a citizen, INS officials asked her if she ever voted in a U.S. election. She replied she had, because she takes her civic duties seriously. As a consequence, INS not only denied her application but also told her that she faced criminal prosecution and deportation for voting illegally. Only after the case caught media attention and raised a lot of public protest did the charges get dropped.

Would it be fair to separate Aarti Shahani, a U.S. citizen, from her father, a legal permanent resident in the United States since 1984? Her father, a small businessman, is facing deportation to India. As early as next week he will be transferred to INS detention following a State sentence relating to his failure to report taxable business earnings. Aarti has taken a leave from the University of Chicago to help support her family. She and her two U.S. citizen siblings continue to fight for their father's right to stay in the United States. They are fighting to keep the family together.

Earlier this month, President Bush urged Congress to establish immigration laws that recognize the importance of families and that help to strengthen them. The Immigrant Fairness Restoration Act does exactly that. Right now, our immigration laws tear families apart. The laws are harsh and offer no chance for review or appeal.

I strongly believe that criminals should be punished. They should repay their debt to society by incarceration, monetary restitution or other sanctions. But I also believe that everyone deserves a chance at a fresh start after the debts are paid. No one should be punished twice.

The 1996 law went too far. It is time to eliminate retroactivity. It is time to restore a system that punishes legal residents in proportion to their crimes. It is time to restore discretion so immigration judges can evaluate cases individually and grant relief to those deserving. It is time to ensure legal residents are not needlessly jailed or imprisoned.

We need legislation that lives up to our nation's legacy as a country of immigrants. I urge my colleagues to support the Immigrant Fairness Restoration Act to grant everyone equal protection under the law.

By Mr. CORZINE:

S. 956. A bill to amend title 23, United States Code, to promote the use of safety belts and child restraint systems by children, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

Mr. CORZINE. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the Child Passenger Safety Act, a bill to ensure that our children are adequately restrained and protected in cars. I am pleased to join my colleague Congressman FRANK PALLONE of New Jersey, who has introduced this legislation in the House and who has a longstanding interest in child safety. I also want to recognize Senator PETER FITZGERALD's commitment to child safety. His recent hearing on the subject of child passenger safety laws shed important light on the need to encourage States to strengthen their laws, and I look forward to working with him to address this issue.

No child should be placed at risk by a simple trip to the local grocer. No child should be in danger on a family trip to the beach. No child should be placed in jeopardy in the daily ride to school. Yet unfortunately, every year almost 1,800 children aged 14 and under die in motor vehicle crashes, and more than 274,000 kids are injured. In fact, traveling in a car without a seatbelt is the leading killer of children in America.

Despite this compelling statistic, the lack of reasonable safety measures for kids in this country is staggering. We know that children who are not restrained are far more likely to suffer severe injuries or even death in motor vehicle crashes, yet approximately 30 percent of children ages four and under ride unrestrained, and of those who do buckle up, four out of five children are improperly secured. Only five percent of four- to eight-year-olds ride in booster seats.

Unfortunately, States have done too little to protect child passengers, a conclusion documented in a recent study of child car safety laws by the non-profit National Safe Kids Campaign. This report rated the effectiveness of each State's laws in protecting children from injury in traffic accidents, and twenty-four of the fifty States received a failing grade, while only two States, Florida and California, received grades higher than a C. My own State of New Jersey's laws were ranked dead last in the survey, because the State does not require any protection for children aged five or older riding in the back seat.

Among the study's alarming findings: no State fully protects all child passengers ages 15 and under, no States require children aged 6-8 to ride in booster seats, 34 States allow child passengers to ride unrestrained due to exemptions, and in many States, children are legally allowed to ride completely unrestrained in the back seat of a vehicle.

Statistics like these make it clear that we need new Federal legislation. States are simply not doing enough to protect children in car accidents, especially older children. That is why today I am introducing a bill that would help ensure that all children are safely secured in cars, no matter where they live. The Child Passenger Safety Act would encourage States to enact laws requiring that children up to age eight are properly secured in a child car safety seat or booster seat appropriate to the child's age or size. The legislation also would encourage States to ensure that children up to the age 16 are restrained in a seatbelt, regardless of where they are sitting in the vehicle.

States that do not meet these critical goals would be subject to the loss of Federal transportation funds, the same approach used to encourage States to establish strong drunk driving standards.

We cannot sit idly by while so many of our children are exposed to unnecessary danger on our nation's roads. I ask my colleagues to join me in support of the Child Passenger Safety Act.

By Mr. WELLSTONE (for himself, Mr. DAYTON, Mr. BYRD, and Ms. STABENOW)

S. 957. A bill to provide certain safeguards with respect to the domestic steel industry; to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WELLSTONE. Mr. President, today I am pleased to introduce, on behalf of myself and Senators DAYTON, BYRD, and STABENOW, the Steel Revitalization Act of 2001. This is the companion measure to H.R. 808, which, as of this moment, has 189 cosponsors in the House. The measure represents a comprehensive approach to the serious crisis facing our domestic iron ore and steel industry.

I want to note that several of the provisions contained in the Act are ones that my colleagues in the bipartisan Steel Caucus here in the Senate and our counterparts in the House have been working on for some time. I want to publicly acknowledge and thank, in particular, Senators ROCKEFELLER and SPECTER for their work in co-chairing the Caucus, and Senator BYRD for his unflinching support of the entire steel industry and his creative efforts on behalf of the industry's working families.

The Steel Revitalization Act includes the following four components: 1. A five-year period of quantitative restrictions on the import of iron ore, semi-finished steel, and finished steel products. Import levels would be set for each product line at the average level of penetration that occurred during the three years prior to the onset of the steel import crisis in late 1997. 2. Creation of a Steelworker Retiree Health Care Fund to be administered by a Steelworker Retiree Health Care Board at the Department of Labor which would be accessible by all steel companies that provide health insurance to retirees at the time of enactment. The Fund would be underwritten through a 1.5 percent surcharge on the sale of all steel products in the United States, both imported and domestic. 3. Enhancement of the current Steel Loan Guarantee program to provide steel companies greater access to funds needed to invest in capital improvements and take advantage of the latest technological advancements. Among other things, the Act would (a) increase the current Steel Loan Guarantee authorization from $1 billion to $10 billion, (b) increase the loan coverage from 85 percent to 95 percent, and (c) extend the duration of financing from 5 to 15 years. 4. Creation of a $500 million grant program at the Department of Commerce to help defray the cost of environmental mitigation and restructuring as a result of consolidation. Companies which have merged will be eligible to apply for such funds if their grant application outlines a merger that will retain 80 percent of the domestic blue-collar workforce and production capacity for 10 years after the merger.

The recent economic conditions facing the U.S. iron ore and steel industry are of particular concern to those in my home state of Minnesota. We are extremely proud of our state's history as the nation's largest producer of iron ore. The iron ore and taconite mines, located on the Iron Range in Minnesota and in our sister state of Michigan, have provided key raw materials to the nation's steel producers for over a century.

You will not find a harder working, more committed group of workers anywhere in this country than you find in the iron ore and taconite industry. This is a group of people who work under the toughest of conditions, are absolutely committed to their families, and who now face dire circumstances, through no fault of their own, because of the effects of unfairly traded iron ore, semi-finished steel, and finished steel products.

Earlier this year, for example, citing poor economic conditions, LTV Steel Mining Company halted production at the Hoyt Lakes, Minnesota mine, leaving 1,400 workers out of good-paying jobs and affecting nearly 5,000 additional workers as well. These are people who believe in the importance of a strong domestic steel industry to the economic and national security of our country.

The Steel Revitalization Act is a comprehensive measure designed to address the multiplicity of needs facing the iron ore and steel industry today. It provides import relief, industry-wide sharing of the huge retiree health care cost burdens resulting from massive layoffs during the 1970's and 1980's, improved access to capital, and assistance for industry consolidation that protects American jobs.

It is imperative that we act and that we act soon. Failing economic conditions, huge health care legacy cost burdens, and staggering levels of iron ore, semi-finished steel, and finished steel imports pose immense threats to this essential industry. I urge my colleagues in the Senate to join in helping to pass this critical legislation at the earliest possible date. Relief for this essential industry is long overdue. We cannot afford to delay.

I ask unanimous consent that a summary of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY—STEEL REVITALIZATION ACT

In mid-January, the United States Steelworkers of America presented a proposal for a comprehensive steel revitalization package. The results is H.R. 808, the Steel Revitalization Act, outlined below. This was introduced on March 1, 2001 by Congressional Steel Caucus Vice Chairman Peter Visclosky, with 84 other original cosponsors, including Congressional Steel Caucus Chairman Jack Quinn and Congressional Steel Caucus Executive Committee Chairman Phil English and Vice Chairman Dennis Kucinich. The measure currently has 172 cosponsors.

TITLE I—Import Relief

This title will mirror H.R. 975, the Steel Import Quota Bill, which was approved by the House in the 106th Congress, but failed to achieve cloture in the Senate.

PROVISIONS OF TITLE I

Provides import relief by imposing 5-year quotas on the importation of steel and iron ore products into the U.S.

The quotas will limit import penetration to the average pre-crisis (1994 to 1997) levels (i.e., the import levels allowed in will be linked to the percentage of domestic consumption of foreign steel in the years preceding the import crisis).

CHANGES FROM H.R. 975

H.R. 975 based quotas on tonnage, not percentage of penetration. Because the market is weakening, we expect tonnage imported to decrease anyway. Therefore, we will link quota numbers to penetration to account for expected decreases in imported tonnage. However, due to differences in statistical methodology, iron ore, semifinished steel and coke product quotas will be determined by tonnage.

H.R. 975 did not include stainless and specialty steel products. This provision will include those products.

This measure will include a short supply clause to ensure that sufficient supplies of steel products are available and to prevent overpricing in some product areas.

TITLE II—Legacy Cost Sharing

This title will address the overwhelming cost many steel companies face in retiree health care due to massive downsizing and restructuring in the 1980s.

PROVISIONS OF TITLE II

Imposes a 1.5 percent surcharge on the sale of steel and iron ore in the U.S. The average cost of a ton of steel is about $500, translating to a $7.50 per ton payment. With an average of 130 million tons of steel sold in the U.S. per year, the fund should generate approximately $880 million per year.

Revenues will be placed in a Steelworker Retiree Health Care Trust Fund, to be administered by the Department of Labor through a newly established Steel Retiree Health Care Board.

The Board will accept applications from steel and iron ore companies for access to the Fund to defray the cost of retiree health care benefits.

Eligible retirees will have retired prior to enactment of the bill.

The fund will be available to defray up to 75 percent of the cost of health care per individual, based on benefits available at the time of enactment adjusted for inflation in the health care market. New benefits negotiated by the union or offered by the company will not be eligible for increased funding.

If there are insufficient funds to cover all eligible health care rebates, the funds will be divided equally on a per-beneficiary basis. The funds will not be divided based on benefit costs.

After the first year the level of the tax will be adjusted annually based on the size of the fund and projected outlays, until the tax sunsets automatically. The tax will never exceed 1.5 percent.

TITLE III—Steel Loan Guarantee Adjustments

This title will address problems with the Steel Loan Guarantee program, which has proven ineffective in finalizing loans. Currently, 7 loans have been approved, but only one has actually resulted in financing for a steel company (Geneva Steel). Steel companies are finding it almost impossible to raise capital through other sources, especially due to plummeting stock prices and decreasing demand. This portion of the bill was hammered out with the help of Senator Byrd's office.

PROVISIONS OF TITLE III

The authorization of the program will be increased from $1 billion to $10 billion.

The guarantee will cover 95 percent of the loan, up from 85 percent under the current program.

The duration of the loan guarantee will be extended from 5 to 15 years.

The period between application to the Board and determination of a guarantee will be set at 45 days.

The Board will be composed of the Secretaries of Treasury, Commerce, and Labor, or their designees, with the Chairmanship held by the Commerce Secretary. Currently the Board includes the Fed and SEC Chairmen, who have limited experience with the steel industry.

The funds made available from loans will be limited to capital expenditures, and will not be used to service existing debt.

TITLE IV—Incentives for Consolidation

This title will encourage the responsible consolidation of the steel industry, which is currently deeply fragmented.

PROVISIONS OF TITLE IV

A $500 million grant program at the Department of Commerce will be created.

Any time up to 1 year after a merger is completed, an eligible company, as defined as a producer of products protected under the Quota portion of the bill, will be able to apply for up to $100 million in grants to defray costs associated with the merger.

The Department of Commerce will review the merger proposal to determine if the merger will promote the retention of jobs and production capacity.

If the merger meets certain thresholds in employment and production capacity retention (retention of 80 percent of the workforce and at least 50 percent of the workforce of the acquired company and 80 percent of production capacity, not utilization), the company applying will be awarded up to $100 million in funds to defray the costs of environmental mitigation. There is clear language stating that the intent of the measure is to promote the MAXIMUM retention of workers, regardless of the 80 percent cutoff.

The applicant will also be given access to the Steelworker Retiree Health Care Trust Fund for new retirees created by the merger, if the merger occurs prior to 2010.

Requirements for employment must be met for ten years to avoid penalties. Penalties for violation of the grant agreements will be weighted more heavily in the first five years, then will gradually phase out during the following five years.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. President, I join with the senior Senator from Minnesota and all my colleagues from steel states, in making every effort to revitalize this important and basic American industry.

There are thirty-four Senators representing twenty-four States in the Steel Caucus, and we all agree that without immediate relief from the flood of foreign steel, the future of the United States steel industry is in jeopardy. The provisions of the Steel Revitalization Act will give our domestic steel industry the time it needs to recover from the import surges of the past three years.

This bill also acknowledges the highly integrated process of making steel. It provides import relief for steel products that include iron ore and semi-finished steel. Minnesota and Michigan are the two leading states in the production of taconite. Taconite is essentially pelletized iron ore that is melted in blast furnaces and then blown with oxygen to make steel. Every ton of imported, semi-finished steel displaces 1.3 tons of iron ore in basic, domestic steel production. This means reduced production, cutbacks, and plant closings, causing devastating economic uncertainty in critical regions of these states.

This bill will provide much needed help to the hardworking people and their families who live in the Iron Range regions of Northeastern Minnesota and Northern Michigan. The bill also helps the steelworkers and the steel-making communities of West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Indiana, Ohio, to name only a few. In this crisis, we are all one family. We are people who believe that America's steel industry is a basic industry, essential to the economic and national security of our country.

Yesterday, the Department of Labor informed 1,400 workers from the LTV Steel Mining Company in Hoyt Lakes, Minnesota that they are eligible for trade adjustment assistance because of the increase in imported steel products. Last December, LTV declared bankruptcy, making these workers permanently unemployed. Trade adjustment assistance will help with extended unemployment benefits, training and relocation. I know that these workers are grateful for this assistance, but it is help that comes after LTV has closed its doors forever.

The bill we introduce today will give the industry time to restructure and provide needed capital to companies through the Steel Loan Guarantee program, a program established through the efforts of the distinguished Senator, ROBERT BYRD. The Steel Revitalization Act will help retired steelworkers with a health care fund; and help companies with necessary consolidation while at the same time requiring them to retain the majority of their workforce.

The United Steelworkers state: "On a level playing field, there would be no steel crisis, but there is no level playing field." The Steel Revitalization Act will help strengthen the steel industry and make American steel competitive once again.

I promise the Minnesota taconite workers, their families, and the communities of the Iron Range, to work hard to pass this bill.

By Mr. REID (for himself and Mr. ENSIGN):

S. 958. A bill to provide for the use and distribution of the funds awarded to the Western Shoshone identifiable group under Indian Claims Commission Docket Numbers 326-A-1, 326-A-3, 326-K, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I rise today for myself and for Senator ENSIGN, to introduce the Western Shoshone Claims Distribution Act. I am re-introducing this much needed bill for the Western Shoshone Tribe from the second session of the 106th Congress. It had been referred to the Indian Affairs Committee, but there was not enough time at the end of the Congress to act on it.

In 1946, the Indian Claims Commission was established to compensate Indians for lands and resources taken from them by the United States. The Commission determined in 1962 that Western Shoshone homeland had been taken through "gradual encroachment." In 1977, the Commission awarded the Tribe in over $26 million dollars. However, it was not until 1979, that the United States appropriated the funds to reimburse the descendants of these Tribes for their loss. Plans for claims distribution were further delayed by litigation; and the Western Shoshone concern that accepting the claims would impact their right to get back some of their traditional homelands.

The Western Shoshone are an impoverished people. There is relatively little economic activity on some of their scattered reservations. Those who are employed, work for the tribal government, work in livestock and agriculture, or work in small businesses, such as day-cares and souvenir shops. They live from pay check to pay check, with little or no money for heating their homes, much less for their children's education. Many of the Western Shoshone continue to be disproportionately affected by poverty and low educational achievement. Many individuals of the Western Shoshone are willing to accept the distribution of the claim settlement funds to relieve these difficult economic conditions. About $128.8 million (in principal and interest) would be distributed to over 6,000 eligible members of the Western Shoshone; $1.27 million (in principal and interest) would be placed in an educational trust fund for the benefit of and distribution to future generations of the Tribe.

The Western Shoshone have waited long enough for the distribution of these much needed funds. The final distribution of this fund has lingered for more than twenty years, and the best interests of the Tribe will not be served by a further delay in enacting this legislation. My bill will provide payments to eligible Western Shoshone tribal members, and ensure that future generations will be able to enjoy the financial benefits of this settlement by establishing a grant program for education and other individual needs. The Western Shoshone Steering Committee, a coalition of Western Shoshone individual tribal members, has officially requested that Congress enact legislation to affect this distribution.

This Act also provides that acceptance of these funds is not a waiver of any existing treaty rights pursuant to the Ruby Valley Treaty. Nor will acceptance of these funds prevent any Western Shoshone Tribe or Band or individual Western Shoshone Indian from pursuing other rights guaranteed by law.

Twenty-three years has been more than long enough.

Finally, I would like to highlight the fact that Senator ENSIGN of Nevada joins me today to introduce this important bill. I know that Senator ENSIGN is concerned, as I, about the delay of the distribution of the claims to the Western Shoshone, and his support for this bill will help ensure that the Tribe will receive their long-awaited compensation.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. BAUCUS:

S. 959. A bill to amend title 49, United States Code, to authorize the Secretary of Transportation to consider the impact of severe weather conditions on Montana's aviation public and establish regulatory distinctions consistent with those applied to the State of Alaska; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, today I rise to introduce the Montana Rural Aviation Improvement Act.

As many in this body know, flying in Montana can be an adventure. There's an old saying in Montana that “if you want the weather to change, wait five minutes”.

Simply put, this act would provide the aviation public with an accurate report of Montana's weather conditions at airports across the state.

This year the Federal Aviation Administration eliminated the use of on-site certified weather observers at Service Level D Airports in Montana. These Level D Airports are an important part of Montana's transportation infrastructure and economy. Without accurate information, both commercial and private planes may not be able to land at these airports because of inaccurate readings from the Automated Surface Observing System, ASOS.

In August 2000 I directed a member of my staff to spend a day at the Miles City weather observation station, where the Automated Surface Observing Systems system was being tested.

I am now even more convinced that the commission of the Automated Surface Observing Systems as a stand-alone weather observation service is a grave mistake.

Many of the following conditions are characteristic of Montana's complicated weather patterns and can't be accurately read by the Automated Surface Observing System.

The Automated Surface Observing System User's Guide, dated March 1998, states that the following weather elements cannot be sensed or reported by Automated Surface Observing System; hail; ice crystals (snow grains, ice pellets, snow pellets); drizzle, freezing drizzle; volcanic ash; blowing obstruction sand, dust, spray; smoke; snow fall and snow depth; hourly snow increase; liquid equivalent of frozen precipitation; water equivalent of snow on the ground; clouds above 12,000 feet; operationally significant clouds above 12,000 feet in mountainous areas; virga; distant precipitation in mountainous and areas and distant clouds obscuring mountains; and operationally significant local variations in visibility.

Five of the seven airports affected provide commercial airline service through the Essential Air Service, EAS, program—a program that is indispensable to the transportation and economy of Eastern Montana. With Automated Surface Observing System on stand-alone, Montana's EAS commercial carrier has expressed real reservations to landing at airports where data may or may not be current or correct, and especially in circumstances where Automated Surface Observing System does not yet read inclement or severe weather conditions common to Montana. As you know, airline service is dependent on one thing—passengers. If they cannot land, who would pay to fly?

This past summer I hosted the Montana Economic Summit, a statewide conference that brought together a strong public-private partnership to examine the evidence, chart a course and focus on those elements we can execute to help move this state forward. Transportation is a strong component of this state's economy. If commercial air service is impacted, it will have a dire and immediate impact on my state's economy, currently ranked at 49th in per capita income and struggling to climb out of the basement.

I would like to add an accountability log compiled by the Miles City weather observers that identifies errors Automated Surface Observing System in data collected and reported by the Automated Surface Observing System at the Miles City Airport from April-July 2000. My staff observed the hourly accounting throughout the day, particularly noting the frustration by weather observers to input, correct and transmit data via the keyboard and terminal. It is extremely important to note that Montana's weather observers see the Automated Surface Observing System as a compatible tool to complement their professional training and provide the safest environment for Montana aviation.

Maintenance and operational backup are of additional concern in Montana's rural landscape. It goes without saying that in instances of severe weather, when the Automated Surface Observing System should go down without backup, it effectively closes the airport to any traffic, commercial or private, that cannot or will not land without the technological benefit of reliable weather data. This process could clearly impact the safety of Montana's flying public.

It cannot be overemphasized that in many smaller airports, specifically Service Level C&D sites, these observers are critical to the overall operation and safety of community airspace. I know you would have felt the same pride and support for the human weather observer positions that I do. We are one team, working for the same goal.

The best available tools should be used to provide the most accurate data in situations involving public safety. The human weather observers assure me that Automated Surface Observing System as a tool, combined with their individual ability to override, correct or supplement weather data gathered by the sensors, will provide the American public with the highest quality safety and weather reporting capability in the world.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 959

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the “Montana Rural Aviation Improvement Act”.

SEC. 2. MONTANA RURAL AVIATION IMPROVEMENT.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 40113 of title 49, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

“(g) APPLICATION OF CERTAIN REGULATIONS TO MONTANA.—In amending title 14, Code of Federal Regulations, in a manner affecting intrastate aviation in Montana, the Administrator of the Federal Aviation Administration shall consider the impact of severe weather conditions on Montana's aviation public and shall, on the basis of such considerations, establish regulatory distinctions consistent with those applied to the State of Alaska for mike-in-hand weather observation.”.

(b) IMPROVED AVAILABILITY OF INFORMATION ON WEATHER OBSERVATIONS.—

(1) FINDING.—Congress finds that the on-site certified weather observation programs at Service Level D sites in Montana are part of the essential air services in Montana and are frequently used by pilots of aircraft under emergency circumstances.

(2) MIKE-IN-HAND WEATHER OBSERVATION.—

(A) REQUIREMENT.—On-site weather observers at sites referred to in paragraph (1) shall use a mike-in-hand weather observation and reporting technique to correct and supplement weather information derived from Automated Surface Observation Sensors (ASOS) at the sites.

(B) MIKE-IN-HAND TECHNIQUE.—For the purposes of this paragraph, a mike-in-hand weather observation and reporting technique is a routine practice by which a weather observer uses radio communication to report information on weather observations directly to a pilot requesting the information, thereby ensuring that the pilot has nearly real-time access to the information.

(C) PERSONNEL TO WHICH APPLICABLE.—This paragraph applies to—

(i) on-site weather observers who are Federal Aviation Administration employees, National Weather Service employees, other Federal Government employees, or State employees; and

(ii) persons providing on-site weather observation services on a full-time or part-time basis under a contract for such services entered into by an official of the Federal Government, an official of the Government of Montana, or an official of a political subdivision of Montana.

By Mr. BINGAMAN (for himself, Mr. CRAIG, Mr. COCHRAN, Ms. COLLINS, Mr. DASCHLE, Mr. DORGAN, Mr. ENSIGN, Mrs. MURRAY, Ms. STABENOW, and Mr. WARNER):

S. 960. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to expand coverage of medical nutrition therapy services under the Medicare program for beneficiaries with cardiovascular diseases; to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce bipartisan legislation with my good friend and colleague from Idaho, Senator CRAIG and a bipartisan group of additional Senators. This legislation, entitled the "Medicare Medical Nutrition Therapy Amendment Act of 2001," provides for the coverage of nutrition therapy for cardiovascular disease under Part B of the Medicare program by a registered dietitian.

This bill builds on provisions in the "Medicare, Medicaid and SCHIP Benefits Improvement and Protection Act," otherwise known as BIPA, which included coverage of Medicare nutrition therapy for diabetes and renal disease taken from my legislation last year, S. 660, the "Medicare Medical Nutrition Therapy Act of 1999."

This bipartisan legislation is necessary because there is currently no consistent Medicare Part B coverage policy for medical nutrition therapy, despite the fact that poor nutrition is a major problem in older Americans. Nutrition therapy in the ambulatory or outpatient settings has been considered by Medicare to be a preventive service, and therefore, not explicitly covered.

While it was significant that nutrition therapy coverage was added to Part B of the Medicare program for diabetes and renal disease, it is critical that the Congress also takes action to cover cardiovascular disease through passage of this legislation, as recommended by the Institute of Medicine in its report, The Role of Nutrition in Maintaining Health in the Nation's Elderly: Evaluating Coverage of Nutrition Services for the Medicare Population.

The report, which had been requested by Congress in the Balanced Budget Act of 1997, found that nutrition therapy has been shown to be effective in the management and treatment of many chronic conditions which affect Medicare beneficiaries, including diabetes and chronic renal insufficiency, but also cardiovascular disease. As the IOM notes, "Cardiovascular diseases are the leading cause of death and major contributors to medical utilization and disability . . . Furthermore, there is a striking age-related rise in mortality from heart disease such that the vast majority of deaths due to heart disease occur in persons age 65 and older."

In addition, the costs associated with cardiovascular disease are substantial with regard to the Medicare program. According to the IOM, ". . . in 1995, Medicare spent $24.6 billion for hospital expenses related to [cardiovascular diseases], an amount that corresponds to 33 percent of its hospitalization expenditures."

Providing nutrition therapy to Medicare beneficiaries could positively impact the Medicare Part A Trust Fund if hospitalization could be reduced or avoided. The IOM found this would likely occur. As the report notes, "Such programs can prevent readmissions for heart failure, reduce subsequent length of stay, and improve functional status and quality-of-life . . . In view of the high costs of managing heart failure, particular admissions for heart failure exacerbations, and the rapid response to therapies, there is a real potential for cost savings from multidisciplinary heart failure programs that include nutrition therapy."

It is exactly the type of cost effective care that we should encourage in the Medicare program. As the American Heart Association adds in their letter of support for this legislation, Dr. Robert Eckel points out that, in one study, "for every dollar spent on [Medicare nutrition therapy] there is a three to ten dollar cost savings realized by reducing the need for drug therapy." With drug costs increasing dramatically, this could potentially result in significant cost savings to Medicare beneficiaries.

Therefore, both the Medicare program and beneficiaries would benefit from this expanded benefit. As the IOM concludes, "Expanded coverage for nutrition therapy is likely to generate economically significant benefits to beneficiaries, and in the short term to the Medicare program itself, through reduced healthcare expenditures. . . ."

Most importantly, it would also improve the quality of care of Medicare beneficiaries. As the IOM report adds, "Whether or not expanded coverage reduces overall Medicare expenditures, it is recommended that these services be reimbursed given the reasonable evidence of improved patient outcomes associated with such care."

For these reasons, I am pleased to be introducing the "Medicare Medical Nutrition Therapy Amendment Act of 2001" today with Senator CRAIG.

However, as this legislation is introduced, I do want to note that the IOM also recommended nutrition therapy be covered based on physician referral rather than a specific medical condition. The original legislation introduced in the last Congress by Senator CRAIG and myself did just that but was made disease-specific in conference last year. While I am pleased to introduce this legislation to include cardiovascular disease, I do believe that we need to move toward eliminating this disease-specific approach in the near future. For example, I believe that Medicare should also provide Medicare nutrition therapy for HIV/AIDS, cancer, and osteoporosis, among other things.

In the meantime, I urge the Congress to expand Medicare nutrition therapy benefits to cover cardiovascular diseases as soon as possible.

I request unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(A) require or prohibit a bidder, offeror, contractor, or subcontractor from entering into, or adhering to, agreements with 1 or more labor organization, with respect to that construction project or another related construction project; or

(B) otherwise discriminate against a bidder, offeror, contractor, or subcontractor because such bidder, offeror, contractor, or subcontractor—

(i) became a signatory, or otherwise adhered to, an agreement with 1 or more labor organization with respect to that construction project or another related construction project; or

(ii) refused to become a signatory, or otherwise adhere to, an agreement with 1 or more labor organization with respect to that construction project or another related construction project.

STATEMENTS ON SUBMITTED RESOLUTIONS

SENATE RESOLUTION 94—EXPRESSING THE SENSE OF THE SENATE TO DESIGNATE MAY 28, 2001, AS A SPECIAL DAY FOR RECOGNIZING THE MEMBERS OF THE ARMED FORCES WHO HAVE BEEN KILLED IN HOSTILE ACTION SINCE THE END OF THE VIETNAM WAR

Mr. CLELAND (for himself, Mr. MCCAIN, Mr. LEVIN, Mrs. HUTCHISON, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. JEFFORDS, Ms. LANDRIEU, Mr. BENNETT, Mr. MILLER, Mrs. MURRAY, Mr. JOHNSON, Mrs. CARNAHAN, Mr. DAYTON, Mr. CONRAD, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. DURBIN, Mr. HATCH, Mrs. CLINTON, Mr. SESSIONS, Mr. ALLEN, and Mr. NELSON of Nebraska) submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agree to:

S. RES. 94

Whereas the House and Senate have passed measures that will expedite the long-overdue memorial commemorating the sacrifices of those who fought and died in World War II;

Whereas with the completion of the World War II Memorial, there will be memorials in the capital of our Nation for each of the major conflicts of the last century;

Whereas approximately 650 members of the Armed Services have been killed in hostile action since the end of the Vietnam War;

Whereas the circumstances surrounding these deaths have been characterized both by large scale conflicts and a number of smaller incidents and actions which have received little attention;

Whereas the sacrifice of these men and women is held as dearly by their fellow citizens as the sacrifice of those claimed by earlier struggles; and

Whereas the loss of these men and women stands in testament to the risks undertaken by all members of the Armed Services each day as they carry out their duty to support and defend the Constitution: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate—

(1) to designate May 28, 2001, as a special day for recognizing the sacrifice of the members of the Armed Forces killed in hostile action since the end of the Vietnam War, and the sacrifices of the families of the members;

(2) to make the designation under paragraph (1) on May 28, 2001, in light of the traditional Memorial Day recognition of the veterans of the United States who have given their lives in defense of our Nation;

(3) to recognize that we live in a time of international unrest and that military service in such a time is inherently dangerous and requires the willingness to face the most extreme hazards at unexpected times and places; and

(4) to acknowledge that the people of the United States owe a debt of gratitude to all members of the Armed Services who place themselves in harm's way each day, and to their families.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 43—EXPRESSING THE SENSE OF THE SENATE REGARDING THE REPUBLIC OF KOREA'S ONGOING PRACTICE OF LIMITING UNITED STATES MOTOR VEHICLES ACCESS TO ITS DOMESTIC MARKET

Mr. LEVIN (for himself and Mr. VOINOVICH) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

S. CON. RES. 43

Whereas the Government of the Republic of Korea over many years has provided aid to the Korean automotive industry enabling that industry to develop into the fourth largest automotive industry in the world, after the United States, Japan, and the European Union;

Whereas the domestic automotive market of the Republic of Korea was completely closed to all international automotive manufacturers until 1990, and not completely open to all automotive manufacturers until 1999;

Whereas in response to complaints by the United States that the Government of the Republic of Korea was practicing unfair trade in the automotive sector, and that there was continuing anti-import bias and increasing disparity in market access for foreign motor vehicles, the Government of Korea signed two Memorandums of Understanding (MOU) with the United States in 1995 and 1998 in an effort to help increase foreign motor vehicle access to the Korean automotive market;

Whereas in the 1998 MOU, the Government of the Republic of Korea pledged specifically to simplify its tax regime in a manner that enhanced market access for foreign motor vehicles, improve the perception of foreign motor vehicles in Korea, simplify and streamline Korea's type-approval system procedures for foreign motor vehicles and other standards issues, and establish a mortgage system for motor vehicles;

Whereas 3 years after signing the 1998 MOU, the Government of the Republic of Korea has not substantially increased market access for foreign motor vehicles and its motor vehicle market still does not operate according to market principles, as evidenced by the fact that the share of the market held by foreign motor vehicles was lower in 2000 than it was in 1998, and remains the lowest of any industrialized nation;

Whereas 3 years after signing the 1998 MOU, the Government of the Republic of Korea has not made sufficient advances in simplifying its tax regime for motor vehicles or improving the perception of foreign motor vehicles in Korea;

Whereas 3 years after signing the 1998 MOU, the Government of the Republic of Korea has not taken the necessary steps to implement the MOU fully and effectively, as evidenced by the extraordinarily low foreign motor vehicle presence in Korea;

Whereas Korea is a major exporter of motor vehicles and automotive parts to the United States, reaching over a total value of $5,910,000,000 last year, compared to a total value of $480,000,000 in United States motor vehicles and automotive parts exported to Korea last year, resulting in a total automotive trade deficit of $5,300,000,000;

Whereas the extremely low level of United States vehicle sales in the Republic of Korea means that there is great difficulty in selling United States made automotive components, systems, and parts in Korea;

Whereas 1,057,620 motor vehicles were sold in the Republic of Korea in 2000, only 4,414 (or 0.42 percent) were imported and only 1,268 of those vehicles (or 0.12 percent) were made in the United States;

Whereas one Korean auto maker maintains monopolistic control of over 75 percent of Korea's domestic market; and

Whereas some Korean organizations and institutions continue to support anti-competitive activities that perpetuate entrenched commercial interests at the expense of free trade, Korean consumers, and the overall Korean economy: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That Congress—

(1) believes strongly that an economically stable Republic of Korea is in the best overall foreign policy and economic interests of the United States;

(2) notes that past practices, such as protection from international competition, preferential access to credit, low interest loans, and the policy of providing assistance to chaebols in general, and the automotive sector specifically, contributed to the 1997-1998 Asian financial crisis, threatened the economic stability of the Republic of Korea and undermined the relationship between the United States and the Republic of Korea;

(3) believes that economic policies and practices effectively limiting United States manufacturers' access to the Korean automotive sector are inconsistent with the general trend toward a market-oriented approach, and that the relationship between the United States and the Republic of Korea has been, and will continue to be, significantly harmed by unfair treatment of imports of United States motor vehicles;

(4) calls on the Republic of Korea to immediately end the practices that have led to the disparity in market access, as well as to take proactive steps to repair the damage done by past policies and practices;

(5) calls on the Republic of Korea to meet the letter and spirit of the commitments contained in the 1998 Memorandum of Understanding it signed with the United States; and

(6) calls on the United States Trade Representative, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of State to monitor and report to Congress on the steps that have been taken to end the disparity in market access for imported motor vehicles in the Republic of Korea.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, today, as co-chairman of the Senate Auto Caucus, I am submitting with my colleague and Auto Caucus co-chairman, Senator VOINOVICH, a Concurrent Resolution urging Korea to remove its automotive trade barriers to U.S. automotive exports.

Our resolutions urges the Republic of Korea to immediately end practices that have restricted market access for U.S. made automobiles and auto parts and meet the letter and spirit of the commitments it made in the 1998 Memorandum of Understanding in Automotive Trade. An identical Resolution is being submitted in the House by the co-chairmen of the House Auto Caucus. I call on both chambers to act swiftly to pass this important measure and send a strong signal to the Government of Korea that it's time to remove these trade barriers.

The Senate and House Auto Caucuses have worked hard to bring attention to the rapidly increasing automotive trade deficit between the United States and South Korea. We have urged our Government to make it a priority to remove barriers to competitive U.S. automotive exports to Korea. It is a matter of simple fairness and American jobs.

When it comes to automotive trade between the United States and Korea, the numbers speak for themselves. Korea has the most closed market for imported motor vehicles in the developed world with foreign vehicles making up less than one half of one percent of its total vehicle market. At the same time, Korea is dependent on open markets to absorb its automotive exports and has become one of the world's major auto exporting countries. The relationship is so blatantly unfair that Korea cannot deny their market is closed. Last year, Korea imported only 1,000 vehicles from the United States and exported nearly 500,000 to the United States.

This grossly unfair automotive trade relationship is due to the continuation in Korea of discriminatory practices such as labeling foreign vehicles as "luxury goods"; ignoring harassment by the media and others of foreign vehicles owners; and an automotive tax system which discriminates against imported vehicles, making them prohibitively expensive.

It's not fair and our message to Korea is that we don't accept it.

That is why we submit this Concurrent Resolution on the even of the next round of trade negotiations between the United States and Korea which start in mid-June. The message we wish to send is clear and simple: we expect to see some significant market opening concessions by the Government of Korea in this round of negotiations and we expect to see the result in the form of actual and significantly increased sales of U.S. vehicles and parts in Korea.

After five years of bilateral negotiations and two major trade agreements, imported automobiles are still locked out of Korea. This situation is unacceptable to the United States Congress and to the American people and it has to change. We expect and hope that the Korean Government will quadruple the effort that is required of them in order to ensure an open Korean market to U.S. automotive products. The nearly 2.5 million men and women working in the largest manufacturing and highest exporting industry in our country deserve nothing less.

RECOGNIZING MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES KILLED SINCE
END OF VIETNAM WAR

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of S. Res. 94, submitted earlier today by Senators CLELAND, MCCAIN, LEVIN, and others.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the resolution by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 94) expressing the sense of the Senate to designate May 28, 2001, as a special day for recognizing the members of the Armed Forces who have been killed in hostile actions since the end of the Vietnam War.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. CLELAND. Mr. President, on next Monday, May 28, and acting pursuant to a joint resolution approved by the Congress back in 1950, the President of the United States will issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe a day of prayer for permanent peace in remembrance of all of those brave Americans who have died in our Nation's service. That is how Memorial Day got started and is what this special day is supposed to be all about.

Whenever Memorial Day comes around, I am reminded of what may well have been the first, and is still one of the finest, memorials to fallen soldiers, the Funeral Oration of the great Athenian leader Pericles, as recorded by the historian Thucydides, during the Peloponnesian War in the 5th Century BC.

For this offering of their lives made in common by them all they each of them individually received that renown which never grows old, and for a sepulcher, not so much that in which their bones have been deposited, but that noblest of shrines wherein their glory is laid up to be eternally remembered upon every occasion on which deed or story shall call for its commemoration. For heroes have the whole earth for their tomb; and in lands far from their own, where the column with its epitaph declares it, there is enshrined in every breast a record unwritten with no tablet to preserve it, except that of the heart.

In that spirit, today I have introduced a resolution calling upon all Americans to especially dedicate Memorial Day of 2001 to those brave American men and women who have given their lives in service to their country since the end of the war in Vietnam. No grand edifices or other public monuments commemorate their deeds, but their service to their country was just as strong, their sacrifice just as great, their families' and communities' loss just as keen as their predecessors in the two World Wars of the 20th Century, Korea and Vietnam.

As the ranking member of the Senate Armed Services Personnel Subcommittee, I have been heavily involved in trying to improve the quality of life for our servicemen and women through such steps as increasing pay and enhancing health and education benefits. It is my deeply held view that not only do we need to take such action to address some disturbing trends in armed forces recruitment and retention, but we owe these individuals nothing less in recognition of their service. Indeed, tomorrow, I will be reintroducing my legislation to update the Montgomery GI Bill, and to continue its relevance for the married, family-oriented Armed Forces we have today by making its education benefits transferrable to the spouse or children of the service member.

The Senate has passed this measure twice, and with the continued leadership and support of Senators WARNER and LEVIN, I am hopeful that this will be the year we provide this valuable recruiting and retention tool.

As recent events have shown perhaps too clearly, Americans have still not fully come to grips with the reality of warfare, especially the Vietnam Conflict. Shortly after World War II—which of all wars in recent history is most widely regarded as necessary and unavoidable—General Dwight D. Eisenhower said, "I hate war as only a soldier who has lived it can, only as one who has seen its brutality, its futility, and its stupidity."

Last year, to focus on the reality of war and on other questions related to the global role of the United States in the post-cold-war world, I had the great honor of being joined by my friend and colleague, Senator ROBERTS of Kansas, in conducting six dialogues on the Senate floor on these and related questions. At the end, we came up with seven general principles, three of which have particular relevance to this occasion:

First, the President and the Congress need to:

Find more and better ways to increase communications with the American people on the realities of our international interests and the costs of securing them;

Find more and better ways to increase the exchange of experiences and ideas between the government and the military to avoid the broadening lack of military experience among the political elite; and

Find more and better ways of ensuring that both the executive and legislative branches fulfill their constitutional responsibilities in national security policy, especially concerning military operations other than declared wars.

Second, as the only global superpower, and in order to avoid stimulating the creation of a hostile coalition of other nations, the United States should, and can afford to, forego unilateralist actions, except where our vital interests are involved.

Finally, in the post-cold-war world, the United States should adopt a policy of realistic restraint with respect to use of U.S. military forces in situations other than those involving the defense of vital national interests. In all other situations, we must:

Insist on well-defined political objectives;

Determine whether non-military means will be effective, and if so, try them prior to any recourse to military force;

Ascertain whether military means can achieve the political objectives;

Determine whether the benefits outweigh the costs—political, financial, military—and that we are prepared to bear those costs;

Determine the "last step" we are prepared to take if necessary to achieve the objectives;

Insist that we have a clear, concise exit strategy, including sufficient consideration of the subsequent roles of the United States, regional parties, international organizations and other entities in securing the long-term success of the mission; and Insist on congressional approval of all deployments other than those involving responses to emergency situations.

Since I came to the Senate, I have been deeply disturbed by the tenor of many of the debates which have occurred in the Congress and with both the Clinton and Bush administrations on a host of important national security issues. Last session, the Senate failed to ratify the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty after little meaningful debate and no Senate hearings. This was one of the most consequential treaties of the decade, and it was sadly reduced to sound-bite politics and partisan rancor. In addition to the CTBT, the Senate has made monumental decisions on our policies in the Balkans and the Persian Gulf, and the future of NATO and the United Nations, all without a comprehensive set for American goals and policies.

And though it is too early to arrive at a firm judgment on this point, and though there is no individual in the national security arena that I have more confidence in or respect more than Secretary of State Colin Powell, I am dismayed by the apparent surge of unilateralism, without meaningful consultation with Congress, displayed by the new administration on subjects ranging from Korean security, to defense of Taiwan, to National Missile Defense, to the Kyoto Accords, to the OECD efforts to fight tax evasion, all once again occurring without clearly articulated goals and policies. In my opinion, we—all of us on both ends Pennsylvania Avenue—have to do better. Simply put, I do not believe we can afford to continue on a path of partisanship and division of purpose without serious damage to our national interests.

I spoke earlier about some key quality of life concerns of today's military, especially education and the GI bill. However, as important as these other factors are, the ultimate quality of life issue for our servicemen and women centers in policy decisions made by national security decision-makers here in Washington relating to the deployment of our forces abroad. It is these deployments which separate families, disrupt lives, and in those cases which involve hostilities, endanger the service member's life itself. This is not to say that I believe our soldiers, sailors, airmen and marines are not fully prepared to do whatever we ask of them. Quite the contrary, they most assuredly are, as my visits to the front lines in the Balkans and Korea have clearly demonstrated to me. But we on this end owe them nothing less than a full and thorough consideration each and every time we put them into harm's way.

There are 13 military installations in Georgia, and I visit the troops there whenever I can. When I go to these bases, I see weary and beleaguered families who are doing their best to make it through the weeks and months without their husbands or wives. This is a heavy toll for our military personnel. It is a price they are ready to pay, but one I want the Senate to understand and appreciate as we continue in our commitment of troops abroad.

Under the Constitution, war powers are divided. Article I, section 8, gives Congress the power to declare war and raise and support the armed forces, while Article II, Section 2 declares the President to be Commander in Chief. With this division of authority there has also been constant disagreement, not only between the executive and legislative branches, but between individual Members of Congress as well, as we have seen in our debates on authorizing the intervention in Kosovo and on the Byrd-Warner amendment concerning funding of that operation. Judging by the text of the Constitution and the debate that went into its drafting, however, Members of Congress have a right, and I would say an obligation, to play a key role in the making of war and in determination of the proper use of our armed forces.

It is generally agreed that the Commander in Chief role gives the President full authority to repel attacks against the United States and makes him responsible for leading the armed forces. During the Korean and Vietnam conflicts, however, this country found itself involved for many years in undeclared wars. Many Members of Congress became concerned with the erosion of congressional authority to decide when the United States should become involved in a war or in situations that might lead to war. On November 7, 1973, the Congress passed the War Powers Resolution over the veto of President Nixon.

The War Powers Resolution has two key requirements. Section 4(a) requires the President to submit a report to Congress within 48 hours whenever troops are introduced into hostilities or situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances. Section 5(b) then stipulates that if U.S. armed forces have been sent into situations of actual or imminent hostilities the President must remove the troops within sixty days—ninety days if he requests a delay—unless Congress declares war or otherwise authorizes the use of force. The resolution also provides that Congress can compel the President to withdraw the troops at any time by passing a joint resolution. It is important to note, however, that since the adoption of the War Powers Resolution, every President has taken the position that it is an unconstitutional infringement by the Congress on the President's authority as Commander in Chief, and the courts have not directly addressed this vital question.

I would submit that although the Congress tried to reassert itself after the Vietnam war with the enactment of the War Powers Resolution, we have continued to be a timid, sometimes nonexistent player in the government that Clausewitz emphasized must play a vital role in creating the balance necessary for an effective war-making effort. Since I came to the Senate, it has been my observation that the current system by which the executive and legislative branches discharge their respective constitutional duties in committing American service men and women into harm's way has become inadequate. Congress continually lacks sufficient and timely information as to policy objectives and means prior to the commitment of American forces. And then, in my opinion, Congress largely abdicates its responsibilities for declaring war and controlling the purse with inadequate and ill-timed consideration of operations.

Reasons for the failure of the War Powers Resolution and for our current difficulties abound. I believe that part of our problem stems from the disputed and uncertain role of the War Powers Resolution of 1973 in governing the conduct of the President, as well as the Congress, with respect to the introduction of American forces into hostile situations. Once again, these disputes continue to resound between both the branches and individual members of the legislative branch.

In all honesty, however, the realities of our government highlight the fact that while the legislature can urge, request, and demand that the President consult with members of Congress on decisions to use force, it cannot compel him to follow any of the advice that it might care to offer. With that in mind, as an institution, Congress can do no more than give or withhold its permission to use force. And while this "use it or lose it" quality of congressional authorizations may make many members leery about acting on a crisis too soon, delays will virtually guarantee, as Senator Arthur Vandenberg once stated, that crises will "never reach Congress until they have developed to a point where congressional discretion is patetically restricted."

I believe that in view of our obligations to the national interest, to the Constitution and to the young American servicemen and women whose very lives are at stake whether it be a "contingency operation" or a full-scale war, neither the executive or legislative branches should be satisfied with the current situation which results in uncertain signals to the American people, to overseas friends and foes, and to our armed forces personnel. In making our decision to authorize military action, Congress should work to elicit all advice and information from the President on down to the battlefield commanders, make a sound decision based on this information, and then leave battlefield management in the hands of those competent and qualified to carry out such a task.

In response to such concerns, last year I introduced S. 2851, a bill which seeks to find a more workable system for Presidential and congressional interaction on the commitment of American forces into combat situations. Today, I am re-introducing this measure. It is a bill derived from the current system for Presidential approval and reporting to Congress on covert operations, a system which was established by Public Law 102-88 in 1991. By most accounts, this system has been accepted by both branches and has worked very well with respect to covert operations, producing both better decision-making in the executive branch and improved congressional input and oversight with respect to these operations. Since overt troop deployments into hostilities almost certainly constitute a greater risk to American interests and to American lives, I believe such a system represents the very least we should do to improve the approval and oversight process with respect to overt military operations. It does not bind or limit the executive branch or military, but offers greater reassurance to those serving us in the Armed Forces that their service in harm's way will have the full backing of not only the President, but the Congress and the American public as well.

Honoring our fallen heroes on Memorial Day is altogether fitting and proper, as President Lincoln said at Gettysburg. However, it is not sufficient. We must also honor them by our words and deeds while they still wear their Nation's military uniforms.

I ask unanimous consent that the list of all American service men and women killed in hostile action since the end of the Vietnam war be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

RECOGNIZING JOHN G. TAYLOR

HON. GEORGE RADANOVICH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. RADANOVICH. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize John G. Taylor for being selected as the Person of the Year 2000 for his accomplishments in the area of religious journalism. The Muslim Public Affairs Council-Fresno presented the award to Taylor on Saturday, April 28, 2001 at their annual awards dinner.

John G. Taylor is a first-generation American. He was born in Brooklyn, New York in 1950. He worked as a reporter for a weekly newspaper and as a correspondent for the New York Times while he earned a degree in journalism at New York University. After college, he worked as a desk editor at newspapers in Hartford and New London, Connecticut. John always made time to do freelance writing on the side.

In 1981, John and his family relocated to Fresno, where he found a job with the Fresno Bee. In 1989, John landed a job as a religious reporter. He covered various historic religious events, including Pope John Paul II's World Youth Day gathering in Denver and the "Stand in the Gap" million-man Christian march in Washington, D.C. He eagerly pursued stories about people and matters of faith for the Fresno Bee until January of 2001. After his tenure at the Bee, John accepted a position as a senior communications specialist/senior writer with Community Medical Centers.

John and his wife Judy have six children and seven grandchildren.

Mr. Speaker, I rise to recognize John G. Taylor for his Person of the Year Award presented by the Muslim Public Affairs Council-Fresno. I urge my colleagues to join me in wishing John G. Taylor many more years of continued success.

SIXTH DISTRICT COACH ACHIEVES A NATIONAL HONOR

HON. HOWARD COBLE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. COBLE. Mr. Speaker, the Sixth District of North Carolina is proud to congratulate John Ralls, who has been named as the runner-up for the National High School Coach of the Year Award. Ralls, coach of the Ledford High School girls' basketball team, received this honor from the Women's Basketball Coaches Association on April 7th. In addition to this achievement, Ralls earlier was named the Southeast Region Coach of the Year and the North Carolina Coach of the Year.

Mixed in with the good news of these accomplishments was a painful back injury that required surgery. "I was kind of out of it," Ralls told the Greensboro News and Record, "so I didn't pick up on it (the award) for about a week." Ralls's first back surgery was in 1992, his first year of coaching. The more recent surgery was much more serious, however, and Ralls was concerned that he might be unable to attend the ceremony on April 7th. Fortunately, Ralls was well enough to participate as well as perform as the assistant coach for the All-American girls' game in Phoenix, Arizona, where he picked up his award.

Ralls came to be nominated for this national award by one of his opponents. His Ledford team scrimmaged Apex High School, and it was the Apex coach, Scott Campbell, who nominated Ralls for the honor that he received.

During his 15 years as coach Ralls has greatly impacted the basketball program, but more importantly, many young lives. In the last seven seasons, the Ledford Varsity girls' basketball team has won three state championships, as well as appearing in the state finals four times.

On behalf of the citizens of the Sixth District of North Carolina, we congratulate Ledford coach John Ralls for his many accomplishments both on and off the basketball court.

INTRODUCTION OF INTERNET EQUITY AND EDUCATION ACT OF 2001

HON. JOHNNY ISAKSON

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. ISAKSON. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Internet Equity and Education Act of 2001.

The Web-Based Education Commission, on which I served as Vice Chairman, set out to discover how the Internet was being used to enhance learning opportunities for all learners regardless of age. We heard testimony from many experts and witnessed many demonstrations of how successfully to use technology in education. Last fall, the Web-Based Education Commission issued its report, "The Power of the Internet for Learning."

Throughout the report, the Commission makes several recommendations for improving and expanding the use of the Internet so that all learners may have greater access to educational opportunities. One specific recommendation made by the Commission was to "[r]evis[e] outdated regulations that impede innovation and replace them with approaches that embrace anytime, anywhere, any pace learning." The bill I am introducing today addresses this recommendation as it applies to postsecondary education.

The Commission identified specific areas that should be addressed immediately if we truly are to embrace anytime, anywhere and any pace learning. The bill I am introducing today provides a limited expansion of internet-based educational opportunities for students. By the next reauthorization of the Higher Education Act we will know if our efforts at expansion were successful and if greater expansions are warranted.

The first provision addressed in this legislation deals with on-line education programs. As a result of past concerns regarding correspondence education, the Higher Education Act limits the number of courses an institution may offer and the number of students an institution may enroll in such courses and remain eligible to participate in the title IV student aid programs. In addition, the Higher Education Act limits the amount of aid a student enrolled in distance education courses delivered via telecommunications may receive if the institution offers half or more of its courses by correspondence or telecommunications. These provisions hinder innovation and do nothing to promote the concept of anytime, anywhere, any pace learning. However, with modest changes to the law, we can lift these rules and allow greater innovation and flexibility that will undoubtedly expand educational opportunities for all learners, without increasing risks to program integrity. Under the bill I am introducing, postsecondary institutions that are already participating in the federal student loan programs with student loan default rates under 10 percent over the three most recent years would face no limit to the number of courses they can offer over the Internet, or the number of students they can teach through telecommunications.

The second provision addressed in this legislation is the repeal of a regulation known as the 12-hour rule with respect to non-standard term programs. This rule governs the amount of "seat-time" students must spend in class per week, and hinders innovation and flexibility in the offering of academic programs as a result of the enormous and expensive administrative burdens it imposes on colleges and universities. In the case of one university offering a nontraditional, non-standard term program, this rule translates into 370,000 reports each year that must be prepared, approved by faculty and stored in a way that they are available for inspection. These reports fill 20 four-drawer file cabinets every year. Who is going to review and read these mind-numbing reports? My guess is that no one is going to actually review or read these mind-numbing reports? My guess is that no one is going to actually review or read these reports, but the government continues to require that the reports be written and retained. Under these circumstances, why would any college try to offer innovative and flexible academic programs specifically designed to expand educational opportunities? This regulation clearly fits the Commission's call for revising outdated regulations that impede innovation. It need to be repealed. The bill I am introducing today repeals this outdated regulation and simply treats non-standard term programs the same as standard term programs with respect to the definition of a week of instruction.

The final provision addressed by the legislation would clarify the incentive compensation requirements currently found in the law. This provision would return to postsecondary institutions the ability to reward employees appropriately for their job performance, as long as they are not directly recruiting students.

This legislation provides much needed changes to the Higher Education Act that will allow all learners to take the fullest advantage of what the newest technologies can provide for their education. I thank the Chairman of the subcommittee, Mr. McKEON, and Ranking Minority Member of the subcommittee, Ms. MINK, for their help in crafting this legislation, and I urge the support of all the members of this body.

MEMORIAL DAY

HON. JIM RYUN

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. RYUN of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, as we approach Memorial Day, I would like to take a moment to reflect on the sacrifices that our veterans have made to keep us free.

This Freedom does not come without a price. It has been earned through the blood sweat, toil and tears of our military servicemen throughout history. Many of these men and women have paid the ultimate sacrifice on battlefields around the globe.

Now we must fulfill our promises to them. We must fulfill a promise of honor, respect and dignity today as we observe the sacrifices to services members.

I urge every American to pause and recognize that all of our liberties have been earned by thanking a veteran for their sacrifice.

Countless soldiers have died for our peace and stability. They knew the threat to their lives when they answered the call to stand up and fight for liberty.

We owe a huge debt of gratitude to this dedicated group of heroic Americans. Let's honor them by giving them our thanks and praise this weekend.

Mr. RADANOVICH. Mr. Speaker, my "yea" vote (Rollcall No. 144) on May 23, 2001 was recorded in error. I intended to vote "no" and would like the RECORD to reflect my position on the Motion to Recommit.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

TAX RECONCILIATION CONFERENCE

HON. GREGORY W. MEEKS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. MEEKS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my deep and alarming concerns about the pending Tax Reconciliation Conference Report.

While the Senate, that now distinguished body across the divide, has managed to scale back the size of the tax cut, Mr. Speaker it is still too large. We cannot afford this tax cut!! If we are to meet our obligations to the nation's youth, elderly and impoverished, we must act responsibly.

However you slice it, Mr. Speaker, this is tax cut for the rich. This is a bank account builder for those in our country who least need the boost.

We are basing this tax cut on projected revenues which, even by the most liberal of estimates, may not materialize.

Mr. Speaker, the most irresponsible part of this tax cut is that it relies on, and threatens the Medicare and Social Security Trust Funds. It is an irresponsible tax cut because it totally ignores hundreds of billions of dollars in interests costs. It seeks to line the pockets of the rich while fleecing the poor on energy, education and housing.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to continue to expose this tax cut for what it really is, an irresponsible, poorly calculated and skewed to the wealthy budget buster.

TRIBUTE TO JAMES A. HARMON

HON. SONNY CALLAHAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. CALLAHAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment to recognize the departure of James A. Harmon as Chairman of the Export-Import Bank of the United States and thank him for a job well-done.

I had the pleasure of working closely with Chairman Harmon on a number of Ex-Im Bank issues during my time as Chairman of the Appropriations Committee's Subcommittee on Foreign Operations. I know firsthand what a strong advocate he has been for the agency and its important mission of supporting U.S. jobs through exports. From making Ex-Im Bank financing available in new foreign markets, to making the Bank more customer friendly, Chairman Harmon has done much to make Ex-Im Bank a more effective tool to support U.S. exports and U.S. jobs.

Chairman Harmon brought to Ex-Im Bank nearly 40 years of private sector experience in investment banking. This gave him an acute appreciation of global capital markets and the challenges U.S. exporters face in obtaining financing to transact business in emerging market economies. He put this experience to work at Ex-Im Bank, developing innovative financing structures, implementing marketing programs to better reach out to small businesses and other exporters that cannot access private sources of financing, and streamlining transaction processing.

At the same time, Chairman Harmon has been a responsible steward of taxpayer dollars. He has managed the Bank's portfolio and resources in a responsible manner, including through some difficult times in the global economy. When the Asian economies went into a tailspin early in Chairman Harmon's tenure, Ex-Im Bank was put to the test. He ably steered the Bank through this crisis, keeping losses on its Asian portfolio to a minimum by restructuring problem credits and aggressively pursuing claim recoveries. The Bank was also able to play a constructive role during this crisis by extending new financing to creditworthy Asian businesses that helped restart stalled U.S. export trade with the region. Ex-Im Bank emerged from the crisis having stood by U.S. exporters and prudently managed its assets.

As Ex-Im Bank moves into the 21st Century, it faces new challenges from both competitor export credit agencies and from new emerging markets. Chairman Harmon has put the Bank on firm footing to face these challenges and continue its important mission.

Once again, I'd like to thank Chairman Harmon for his four years of service to Ex-Im Bank and wish him well in his future pursuits.

STATEMENT OF INTRODUCTION FOR BAH REDUCTION LEGISLATION

HON. WALTER B. JONES

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce legislation aimed at improving the quality of life for our military personnel.

Last Year, Congress began funding an important Department of Defense initiative to reduce the out-of-pocket housing costs for service members residing in off-base housing. That program envisioned decreasing the out-of-pocket costs from almost 18.9 percent of housing costs incurred by our servicemen and women in 2000 down to zero in 2005. The average E-6 will receive about $175 more a month in BAH by 2005, while the average E-4 will receive about $111 more, allowing them to seek better housing options.

This is a great initiative that will have real benefits for almost 750,000 military personnel. However, I believe that we can and should do more.

Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Installations Randall Yim recently testified before the House Military Construction Appropriations Subcommittee that up to 60 percent of all DoD housing is substandard. Two-thirds of this inventory is over 30 years old and requires a substantial annual investment to meet the maintenance requirements. In the barracks, over 50 percent of the inventory is over 30 years old. While we are taking many steps to eliminate this substandard housing through increased funding and several privatization initiatives, it will still be 2010 before most services have eliminated their poor quality housing—2014 for at least one service.

Our men and women in uniform risk their lives to protect the freedoms that we enjoy today. We owe it to those servicemen and women, and their families, to do everything we can to improve their living conditions.

It is for that reason, that I am introducing this legislation today. The legislation is very simple. Rather than waiting five years to buy down the out-of-pocket housing costs of our military personnel, this legislation would reduce out-of-pockets to 7.5 percent by the end of 2002, and zero by the end of 2003. By more rapidly reducing the costs associated with living off-base, more of our military personnel will be able to move into quality housing for them and their families.

I urge my colleague to join me in supporting this important legislation to improve the standard of living for those bravely serving in our Armed Forces.

INTRODUCTION OF INTERNET EQUITY AND EDUCATION ACT OF 2001

HON. HOWARD P. "BUCK" McKEON
OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. McKEON. Mr. Speaker, today I join Representative ISAKSON in introducing the Internet Equity and Education Act of 2001.

The proposed amendments to the Higher Education Act are modest, but will provide an immediate benefit to students and improve the ability of postsecondary institutions to offer instruction over the Internet.

I will focus my comments on the issue of incentive compensation. There has been widespread acknowledgment within the higher education community and at the Department of Education that this provision and the implementing regulation that mimics the statute are unclear and the cause of much confusion with respect to allowable activities. The language included in this legislation attempts to clarify the intent of Congress, while recognizing that this particular provision needs to be regulated in a clear and concise manner with input from all interested parties.

For example, the reference to "other incentive, non-salary payment" in this bill clarifies that the statutory prohibition on certain monetary compensations extends only to bonuses, commissions, and similar payments. It does not prohibit setting or prospectively adjusting salary from time to time, based on performance of legitimate job functions.

The reference to payments "based directly on success" in securing enrollments clarifies that institutions may compensate admissions personnel based on their performance of legitimate recruiting activities and are commonly undertaken by recruiters on behalf of institutions of higher education prior to enrollment and the start of classes. Such activities and practices include, but are not limited to, recruiting visits to high schools; telephone calls and similar communications (including written letters and e-mail) aimed at recruiting prospective students; personal interviews of prospective students; tours for prospective students; providing various academic and general, school-related information to prospective students; and obtaining certain information from prospective students, including but not limited to applications, transcripts, high school diplomas, and other documentation needed to complete an application to enroll at an institution of higher education.

In addition, the change in language is intended to clarify that employee and owner participation in the profits of an institution is permitted.

The reference to persons or entities "directly engaged" in recruiting or awarding financial aid clarifies that the statutory prohibition applies only to those whose primary function is to recruit students or award financial aid. It is not intended to apply to supervisors or higher-level executives who, although they may supervise such persons or be above them in the institution's organizational chart, do not recruit prospective students or award financial aid. In addition, this change clarifies that the statutory prohibition is not intended to apply to contractual arrangements with third parties, such as web services providers marketing companies, or other service providers that have no control or authority over admissions or enrollments at the contracting institution.

Finally, this provision is being deleted from Section 487 and placed in a new Section 484C. It was never the intent of Congress that this provision should be deemed an element or condition of institutional, programmatic, or student eligibility. In changing the placement of the provision, it will give the Secretary the discretion to levy appropriate sanctions, in the event an institution is found to have violated the statutory ban.

I believe this clarification of the incentive compensation provision, along with the provisions addressing the 12-hour rule and correspondence education limitations, will provide postsecondary institutions with much needed relief from "outdated regulations that impede innovation," and will allow the institutions to provide students with approaches to education "that embrace anytime, anywhere, any pace learning." It will do so within the context of maintaining the integrity of our student financial aid programs. I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

THE BUSH ADMINISTRATION HAS NOT KEPT FAITH WITH OUR NATION'S VETERANS

HON. LANE EVANS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, on Monday we will commemorate Memorial Day. We will pause to humbly and gratefully remember the service and sacrifice of the men and women who have served in uniform and have defended and preserved our shared ideals.

Shamefully, on Memorial Day 2001, hundreds of thousands of disabled veterans and their families continue to wait for action on claims for veterans benefits now pending before the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA). To his credit, the Secretary of Veterans Affairs, Anthony Principi, has been candid with veterans and their advocates about the crisis that exists today in veterans' claims adjudication. Repeatedly, Secretary Principi has stated that addressing the backlog of 513,309 claims currently pending before regional offices of the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) is his number one priority. In acknowledging the claims adjudication crisis, Secretary Principi recently stated in an interview with the Veterans of Foreign Wars, "In the short-term, we will train more specialists. The staff will be increased to assist in clearing the backlog."

Secretary Principi is to be commended for recognizing the size and scope of the problem. He has taken action to authorize the hiring of additional staff needed to begin addressing the claims crisis. He has made known the need for additional resources to resolve this crisis successfully.

However, President Bush and his Office of Management and Budget (OMB) have failed to promptly take actions needed to ameliorate the burgeoning veterans claims adjudication crisis. For its part, OMB established a significant roadblock by refusing to submit to Congress a supplemental funding request for less than $30 million needed to pay for the critically needed additional VA staff Secretary Principi is hiring.

Early this year, VA requested a supplemental appropriation of $29.1 million for this fiscal year to pay for the additional staff needed to address the backlog of compensation, pension and education claims. Despite the evident need for this funding, VA's request has been held hostage to the Bush administration's $1.6 million tax cut proposal. The requested supplemental was denied by OMB. VA was told to try to find the money elsewhere, such as in the budget for health care. As most Members of Congress know, VA has no surplus of funds in its health care budget. Stealing from Peter to pay Paul does not honor the service of America's veterans.

Those who have taken the time to talk with and listen to veterans understand that the time veterans are forced to wait for medical care is long and excessive, especially for certain specialized care from many VA medical facilities. The Committee on Veterans' Affairs submitted a bipartisan request to the Budget Committee pointing to a more than $1 billion shortfall in the Administration's 2002 budget.

Since the Bush administration took office, the backlog of veterans' claims has increased by more than 100,000. The number of claims awaiting a decision for more than 6 months also continues to grow—from 95,680 on January 19, 2001, to 143,777 on May 16, 2001.

A number of factors have caused the increased backlog. The processing of VA claims is a complex and labor intensive job. Recent legislation requires VA to obtain records in the custody of the Federal Government, including military records and medical evidence, before deciding a claim for service-connected compensation. This assistance to veterans supported by President Bush is intended to assure that veterans' claims would be treated with fundamental fairness and result in an accurate and fair decision. I am under no illusion that by bringing in additional staff, the backlog will disappear overnight. Similarly, I understand the backlog of claims will not be reduced while quality decision-making is maintained and improved unless and until additional resources are made available—resources needed to hire additional personnel and train them appropriately.

Critically needed additional funding must be requested by the Administration. Alternatively, the backlog will continue to increase and the time taken to resolve it will likewise continue to increase. Surely this will not honor our veterans.

The question today is how soon will VA exhaust funds to pay for the costs of needed additional staff? What other programs are being cut to cover the costs of the additional employees desperately needed to adjudicate claims? How many veterans will die while awaiting the adjudication of their claims? This is certainly no way for a grateful nation to honor its veterans.

Mr. Reyes and I have today introduced H.R. 1981. This bill would authorize an emergency supplemental appropriation to provide the funding needed to address the crisis in VA claims adjudication that exists today. I call on President Bush to support this legislation or submit a similar request to the Congress now.

This Memorial Day, our Nation's veterans will be the subject of many finely crafted speeches delivered to honor them. Words, however, are not enough. Our deeds are a better measure of how well we truly honor our veterans. The need for additional resources is real. Claims adjudication is, and will remain for some time, a labor-intensive work. Let our deeds match our words of commemoration and remembrance. Let us provide the critically needed funding to pay for the resources needed to address the backlog and let us do this now.

During the campaign for President, then candidate Bush said, "health care for veterans is a complicated, bureaucratic process involving too many delays and uncertainties in coverage. Disability compensation claims can be an even longer ordeal, taking an average of 165 days to complete. So chaotic is the process there is now a backlog of nearly one-half million claims. This is no way to treat any citizen, much less a veteran of our Armed Forces. The veterans health-care system and the claims process will be modernized, so that claims are handled in a fair and friendly way." Mr. President, I agree and now is the time for you to act.

Candidate Bush also said, "I have great faith in those who serve our nation—in the temper of their will and the quality of their spirit. Our men and women in uniform love their country more than their comfort. They have never failed us, and we must not fail them." Mr. President, we must not fail those who have served and sacrificed. Take action now to request the additional funding so desperately needed for our Nation to keep faith with our veterans. It is time for your words and deeds to be one.

TRIBUTE TO CAPTAIN DAVE WALKER

HON. C.L. "BUTCH" OTTER

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. OTTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a great American, Dave Walker, who today will be laid to rest in Arlington Cemetery. Captain Dave Walker served his country on the sea, in the sky, and among the stars.

Captain Walker graduated from the United States Naval academy in 1966, completed his flight training, and became an F-4 Phantom Pilot. He led many combat missions over Vietnam. After returning from Vietnam, Dave became a test pilot and helped the Navy transition from the F-4 to the F-14 Tomcat that is still flown today. During his naval career, he was awarded the Distinguished Flying Cross, six Air Medals, and the Vietnamese Cross of Gallantry, among others.

In 1978 Dave was selected by NASA for astronaut training and graduated in 1979. He served in many important support roles, including chase plane pilot for STS-1, and mission support leader for STS-5 and 6. Dave first went into space aboard the Space Shuttle discovery during Mission STS 51-A in 1984—the first salvage operation completed in space.

Dave Walker returned to space in 1989 as commander of STS-30 aboard the Space Shuttle Atlantis. Dave and his crew again contributed to scientific knowledge by launching the Magellan space probe to Venus. He also commanded the Space Shuttles Discovery and Endeavour on important missions in recent years.

After leaving NASA in 1996 Dave Walker entered the private sector, and he and his wife purchased a home in McCall. Dave quickly advanced as President of the Idaho Aviation Association and the Idaho Aviation Foundation, and worked tirelessly to promote and protect the aviation community. He was particularly interested in working to reopen Cascade Reservoir Air Strip, one of the most beautiful fields in Idaho.

Sadly, Dave will never get the chance to fly into Cascade Reservoir airstrip again. He was diagnosed with cancer in March and passed away on April 23rd. He is survived by his wife Paige, his children Michael and Mathieson, and a grateful nation. Heroes are buried in Arlington Cemetery, but heroes like Dave Walker will live on in the lives of the people he fought to protect in Vietnam, the knowledge he contributed to space technology and aviation, and the friendships he made in Idaho.

RECOGNITION OF GLENN ROYAL BATTY

HON. GEORGE R. NETHERCUTT, JR.

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. NETHERCUTT. Mr. Speaker, this coming weekend, the United States will observe Memorial Day and honor the service of America's soldiers, sailors, airmen and marines. As we take time this weekend to reflect on the sacrifices of members of our Armed Forces, I commend to the attention of my colleagues a poem written by a constituent, which I am entering into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Glenn Royal Batty, of Spokane, Washington, has authored a moving poem entitled "The Soldier," which serves as a reminder of both the hardships of military life and the dedication of the American soldier. As Mr. Batty noted in a personal letter introducing his poem, "There can be no greater sacrifice than to give one's life for another but no greater shame than to spend life for less." I urge my colleagues to take a moment from their busy lives and reflect upon the message in this poem.

THE SOLDIER

(By Glenn Royal Batty)

I am one of a chosen few, a warrior of might.
And I will stand or I may fall, but I will join the fight.

I am he who fights for you, throughout history.

While vain men speak of glory, to hide hypocrisy.

The captain calls for volunteers, to mount a bold defense,

While shades are drawn and shutters closed with indifference.

And as the ranks are gathered, above the rolling plain.

The soldier takes his courage into battle once again.

Battle is begun, and with it fear's perfume.
When this day is done, we'll see a bloody moon!

As you sing of glory and righteousness of cause,

We march courage six abreast, into the devil's jaws.

There to face our destiny with honor or in shame.

But to face it not, is not a thing we know, or can explain.

You won't feel my deadly steel or taste this fearsome blade,

But it will haunt your dreams at night, until its price is paid.

And you might wish to turn away, before the bugle sounds.

For righteousness is hard to find within a battleground.

Battle is begun! May God be on our side.
We pray a kingdom come, where peace may yet abide.

For fame or notoriety, what is the value
there?

For land or grudge, we cannot see. What purpose?
I declare!

For names, twice whispered on men's lips or tails of great renown,

We will march to battle, for honor is our crown!

Battle is begun! The day is warm, the wind blows sweet.

It stirs the banners with each breath,
While valiant souls together meet to share ignoble death.

Battle is begun no matter where or when,
We will fight and die. That's how it's always been.

I am one of a chosen few You're not to blame, It's what I do.

And if God's mercy will decree, with hardened heart and strength of will,

Throughout the flow of history, I will be fighting still.

THE CONSERVATION SECURITY ACT

HON. JOHN R. THUNE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. THUNE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank all Members who joined as original cosponsors of H.R. 1949. A special thank you goes to Ms. KAPTUR of Ohio, the lead cosponsor and Ranking Member of the Agriculture Subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations. In this spirit of bipartisanship, we can move forward to address the conservation needs of the farmers in rural America.

The Conservation Security Act (CSA) would create a win-win situation for farmers and the environment. The bill would allow farmers, ranchers and other agricultural producers to participate in a voluntary, incentive-based conservation program. Under this legislation, the farmer or rancher would not have to set aside land. It would give them resources to carry out conservation practices on working lands as they work to make a living off the land.

CSA would allow landowners and operators to enter into contracts and receive payments based on the type of conservation practices they are willing to plan, implement and maintain. Conservation practices may include soil and residue management, contour farming, and cover cropping as well as comprehensive farm plans that take into account all the resource concerns of the agricultural operation.

CSA would establish three tiers of progressive conservation practices, plans and payment levels while allowing for continued participation in other agriculture conservation programs. Under the legislation, a participant may also receive payments based on established practices and for adopting innovative practices and systems, pilot testing, new technologies, and new conservation techniques. The program is voluntary.

I believe CSA is a balanced, responsible approach to encouraging conservation on our agricultural lands. As Congress moves forward on reshaping federal farm policy, conservation, and CSA specifically, will be an important part of the discussion. I hope my colleagues will consider cosponsoring this bill.

TRIBUTE TO COMMANDER JAMES F. STADER

HON. DAVID L. HOBSON

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize an outstanding Naval Officer, Commander James Stader, who has served with distinction and dedication for almost two years for the Secretary of the Navy, as the Congressional Liaison Officer for Civil Engineering, Appropriations Matters Office under the Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Financial Management and Comptroller). It is a privilege for me to recognize his many outstanding achievements and commend him for the superb service he has provided to the Department of the Navy, the Congress, and our great Nation as a whole.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

During his tenure in the Appropriations Matters Office, which began in August of 1999, Commander Stader has provided members of the House Appropriations Committee, Subcommittee on Military Construction as well as our professional and personal staffs with timely and accurate support regarding Department of Navy plans, programs and budget decisions. His valuable contributions have enabled the Subcommittee on Military Construction and the Department of the Navy to strengthen their close working relationship and to ensure the most modern, well trained and well equipped naval forces attainable for the defense of our great nation.

Mr. Speaker, James Stader and his wife Clara have made many sacrifices during his career in the Navy. His distinguished service has exemplified honor, courage and commitment. As they depart the Appropriations Matters Office to embark on yet another great Navy adventure in the service of a grateful nation, I call upon my colleagues to wish them both every success and the traditional Navy send-off "fair winds and following seas."

HELP SCHOOLS HELP PUPILS

HON. GARY A. CONDIT

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. CONDIT. Mr. Speaker, we hear a lot about the crises in education and the failure of our public schools. Recently, Mr. James Enochs, the Superintendent of Modesto's schools, addressed this issue at a district meeting. I think we can all benefit from the comments and opinions of those who are involved in the front lines of education. I submit Superintendent Enochs' comments for insertion into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

HELP SCHOOLS HELP PUPILS

(By James C. Enochs)

I have been asked to comment briefly on what the schools need. It seemed like an agreeable enough topic. But, as with much of the discussion about education, if the answer is neat and simple, it is probably wrong and misleading.

I am not a great pep-talk speaker. I think it is more important that we all face up to some of the grim realities that confront us. I get a lot of unsolicited advice in my job. Much of it from my friends in business, or as they prefer to call it, the "real world." Our conversations invariably end with my reminding them that they have three distinct and important advantages over schools:

You get to screen your applicants. You can take them or reject them based on the qualifications or lack of qualification they bring to the opening. We can't do that. We are required to take everybody irrespective of their qualifications.

You can pay them to get them to do what you want. We can't do that.

And, of course, if they don't please you, you can fire them. We can't do that, either.

And thank goodness we can't. Because those are hardly solutions to the kind of issues we face. Which is why I have chosen to be very direct and begin by telling you that you probably can't help us very much with the things schools need most. We need—we desperately need: More stable families; fewer abused children; less dope, alcohol and violence in the lives of our students; fewer gangs in the schools and more parents; we need kids who are fed before they come to school; we need more parents with the sense to discipline their children and guts enough to turn off the television; we need young children whose parents have taken the time to read to them; we need fewer fathers—and recently mothers—who think the axis of the earth passes through the 50-yard line; adults, suffering from a prolonged adolescence, who mistakenly believe that Saturday's hero is more important than Monday through Friday's good citizen and scholar; and we need 400-500 fewer pregnant unwed girls every year.

That's what schools need most. And, of course, that is what society needs most. In effect, my problems are yours; I only have to deal with them before you. And they certainly don't yield to something as simple, and unthinking as just don't accept them, or "can" them if they don't shape up. And I do think that an understanding of that—an understanding that not all failure is institutional failure—is a necessary precondition for a genuine partnership between schools and business.

Modesto City Schools, with nearly 35,000 students, is among the 25 largest school districts in California. And one of every eight children in America lives in California. . . . Our school enrollment is greater than that of the 24 smallest states combined. And the public needs to understand something about that school population. And if you understand California, you will understand Modesto City Schools.

There is no place on the face of the earth with a more diverse population. Two-thirds of the state's newcomers are foreign-born. In fact, 15 percent of California's population was born in another country; and in the public schools, more than 30 percent of the children are of parents born in a foreign country; and for one-third of the children in California, English is a foreign language.

In Modesto City Schools, we have nearly 7,000 students who speak more than 40 different languages. That's an increase of 157 percent in the past 10 years. While it is hard for some people to accept, Modesto and, as a result, Modesto City Schools has taken on the characteristics of most urban areas in California: A very low educational level of parents. Nearly 30 percent of the parents of MCS children did not graduate from high school; a high percentage of welfare recipient families: nearly 9,000 of our students.

Families constantly on the move: We measure mobility on the number of students who leave or enter school after the first school month: nearly 10,000 students a year. Only 30 percent of the students who start kindergarten with us are still enrolled—by the eighth grade.

And I have mentioned the high and increasing number of children who do not speak or read English as their primary language. Just to translate that into something more manageable, the raw material resulting from these trends and the social disintegration of the family, has turned a typical class of 10th graders into a statistical nightmare in the Golden State:

Eight students will be on public assistance;

Three students will have sexually transmitted diseases;

Four will speak no English—none;

Three will be teen parents;

Three will grow up in public housing;

Two will be victims of child abuse;
Three will be regular drug users;
Three of them will have been born out of wedlock;

And half of them will have experienced at least one divorce in their family.

Now, if you look at that list, it must occur to even the greatest critic of public schools that educators didn't do it—we didn't introduce them to drugs, or break up their families, or force them onto public assistance, or get them pregnant, or any of the other myriad problems they pack with them to school. So, it's no good to say, "That's your problem, Mr. Superintendent; I pay my taxes and that's enough." Well, today's social dynamite piling up in the nation's school is tomorrow's headache for all of us, including the business community.

Among other consequences, the link between the social ills that plague many young children and early school failure, later high school dropouts, and ultimately a functionally illiterate or marginally literate, unskilled work force is an inexorable progression.

And to paraphrase that oil filter commercial, we can deal with it now, or we can deal with it later. But we have a problem. It was captured very nicely about a year ago in a cover article in Time magazine with the rather sharp title, "A Nation of Finger Pointers."

The major premise of the article was that we are becoming a nation of passive crybabies. People who absolve themselves of any individual responsibility, sit on their duffs, and assume the status of victims as a result of someone else's incompetence or even malevolence.

I get it from both ends. Some teachers and administrators want to blame it on the absentee parents who are sending us all these undisciplined kids who do not value education and are loaded down with problems created by those parents. It's the ill-prepared raw material argument: "How can we teach kids like that?"

On the other end of the process, I get it from the business community who says much the same thing, but substitutes "educators" for "parents." Educators are sending us all these undisciplined kids who do not value work and are loaded down with problems created by the schools. It's the same ill-prepared raw material argument: "How can we hire kids like that?"

So, what we have here is a problem in which everyone is either a victim or a scapegoat. If we have a problem, don't join hands anymore, point fingers. What we don't have is that old-fashioned American interdependency, shared responsibility, mutual understanding, the common ground where people meet and solve problems. And that is what this is about today.

We need community people—business people—to support us in our efforts to elevate academic excellence and good character—to convey to the young that we value the qualities we pay lip-service to. We need businesspeople who can stimulate interest in career development and training. Students have heard it all before from teachers and counselors. They need to see it and hear it from the people who will be doing the hiring and firing.

And finally, we just need more adults who will spend time with these kids; kids who haven't had many caring adults in their lives. Someone to read to them, to listen to them read, to treat them like they are somebody.

I can't tell you how many people tell me, "I feel so sorry for those kids." Well, frankly, that's not good enough.

There is a revealing exchange between the great Englishman Samuel Johnson and his friend and biographer James Boswell in the greatest biography ever written. Boswell confesses, "I have often blamed myself for not feeling for others as sensibly as many say they do." Johnson replies, "Don't be duped by them anymore. You will find these very feeling people are not ready to do any good. They pay only by feeling."

He's right. When the young have grown to adulthood, they will not think kindly of those adults who have given them sympathy without help.

TRIBUTE TO HOLLI DUNAYER

HON. CAROLYN MCCARTHY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mrs. MCCARTHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I proudly recognize the academic and personal achievements of Holli Dunayer of East Meadow, New York.

Holli is a spirited and dedicated woman who has triumphed through life's continual ups and downs.

Although Holli gave her all to the North Bellmore Hair Salon family business, she always wanted to contribute to the community. While managing the salon, Holli helped the neighborhood's homeless, organizing a benefit for the poor from her store.

But times were difficult for Holli. In the early 1990s, she lost her home, was divorced, and went on public assistance so she could care for her daughter, Samantha, then seven.

But Holli bounced back.

In 1996, she enrolled in Nassau Community College, where she received an Associate's Degree in sociology. Holli was awarded a partial scholarship to Adelphi University, where she received a Bachelor's Degree in social work last year. On Sunday, May 20, 2001, Holli received a Master's Degree in social work from Adelphi University.

While Holli pursued her Master's Degree, she interned in my Hempstead District office. I was impressed by her commitment, and I hired her as a full-time legislative aide to handle education, IRS, grants and passports. I'm excited to have a second social worker on my staff.

Holli is a recipient of a $5,000 Maurice Paprin Memorial Fellowship given to students who demonstrate commitment to social change through past or present work.

Holli calls her employment "poetic justice" since she has gone from the government taking care of her to being a government employee helping others in tough situations. Holli is proof that hard work and dedication is all you need to make your dreams come true.

I congratulate Holli and her daughter, Samantha, now 15, on their achievements and Holli's graduation.

I am honored to have her as a member of my staff and as my friend.

INTERNATIONAL MIGRATORY BIRD DAY

HON. ROBERT A. BORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. BORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in recognition of International Migratory Bird Day (IMBD), which was officially celebrated on Saturday, May 12, with hundreds of events across the country including one at Philadelphia Zoo.

International Migratory Bird Day celebrates the annual return of millions of birds from wintering habitats in Latin America and emphasizes that the continued enjoyment of these birds depends upon our actions as consumers, homeowners, and citizens. At least 200 species of birds migrate to, from and through Philadelphia each year.

In addition to the sheer enjoyment of watching them, migratory birds are important biological indicators of ecosystem health as well as sentinels for potential human health risks. Their populations are declining dramatically due to the destruction and degradation of their habitat throughout the Americas. Making small changes to some of our daily habits can contribute to the conservation of migratory birds and their habitats, as well as the planet's overall health.

One small change is drinking shade-grown coffee, which helps protect habitat for migratory birds. According to experts at the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, the way coffee is grown can have a direct effect on many of the birds we see in our neighborhoods each spring. Coffee farms or plantations that leave a canopy of shading trees ("shade-grown coffee") benefit migratory birds by providing habitat for their wintering grounds in Mexico, Central and South America, and the Caribbean. The Wilson's warbler, scarlet tanager, northern oriole, indigo bunting, and wood thrush are among the dozens of migratory birds that spend part of their lives in the U.S. and that winter in the coffee-growing regions of Latin America.

Encouraging our local coffee shop or grocery store to carry shade-grown coffee is one way that each of us can make a difference. Another way is becoming more informed about migratory birds and the threats to their habitats through involvement in bird watching and other programs such as those at Philadelphia Zoo. The Zoo's involvement in avian conservation dates to before the opening of its original Bird House in 1916. More recently, scientists at Philadelphia Zoo have played a major role in the conservation of the American bald eagle. Once on the brink of extinction due to the use of the pesticide DDT, which was banned in the 1970s, the bald eagle is a national conservation success story. The Zoo's pair of eagles was brought to the Zoo by wildlife rehabilitators when it became clear that neither could be reintroduced to the wild. Over the years, this pair has bred successfully and, through collaboration with the Pennsylvania Game Commission, their offspring have been placed in the nest of wild eagles. At least two of these offspring successfully fledged from their foster parents, contributing to the growing population of American bald eagles.

Today, America's First Zoo is building a new Avian Conservation Center that will feature state-of-the-art exhibitions and research facilities illustrating the diversity of the world's bird populations and their varied habitats. A central focus will be the challenges of conservation and preservation of rare species like Micronesian kingfishers, which are extinct in the wild. A key aim of the Center is to increase visitor awareness of avian conservation and issue a "conservation call to action."

We can also encourage innovative public-private partnerships such as the bird conservation initiative that was announced at the Zoo, when City and U.S. Fish and Wildlife officials met to formally recognize Philadelphia as the third Migratory Bird Treaty City in the nation.

I applaud the City of Philadelphia, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, and Philadelphia Zoo for their efforts to promote the conservation, habitat restoration, protection and hazard reduction of migratory birds, and all those organizations and individuals celebrating International Migratory Bird Day.

INTRODUCTION OF THE COBRA COVERAGE EXTENSION AND AFFORDABILITY ACT OF 2001

HON. FORTNEY PETE STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to join with my dear friend Representative JOE MOAKLEY (D-MA) to introduce the COBRA Coverage Extension and Affordability Act of 2001.

COBRA is the law that allows employees who face a change in their work status—and would otherwise lose their health insurance—to be able to continue that same coverage through their previous employer for a period of generally 18 months and sometimes as much as 36 months depending upon their particular situation. During this continuation period, employees must pay 102% of the cost of their current health insurance plan. That means they pay their previous employer share, their own share, and an extra 2% to make up for any administrative costs faced by their previous employer for maintaining their coverage.

COBRA was created in order to provide a bridge for workers to be able to maintain health benefits for themselves and their families. It has been in place since 1986 and is overdue for remodeling.

The bill we are offering today makes three key improvements to existing COBRA law:

(1) It extends the length of time that COBRA continuation benefits are available for all workers and their families from an average of 18 months to 5 years with workers paying 102% of premiums as required under current law.

(2) It creates a new category of COBRA continuation coverage for people age 55 and over. Anyone age 55 and over is eligible to extend the 5 year limitation on COBRA coverage. They are able to keep their COBRA coverage until they become eligible for Medicare. If they choose to extend this coverage beyond the 5 year limitation, they will be responsible for premium payment of 125% the cost of the employer plan.

(3) It makes all COBRA recipients eligible for a refundable federal tax credit worth 50% of their premium costs.

The attraction of the COBRA program is that it enables people to maintain continuity of coverage when they are between jobs, or temporarily in a job that doesn't offer health benefits. It also usually allows them to maintain much more comprehensive coverage than would be available in the individual health insurance marketplace at a similar cost. Unfortunately, 18 months is often not enough time for someone to obtain a new job with comprehensive health care benefits for themselves and their family.

Our legislation would allow people to maintain the safety net of COBRA for up to five years—which should provide ample time for a new position with solid benefits to be found. Because the worker pays 102% of the premiums, there is no cost to the employee of maintaining them in their group plan.

Our legislation goes even further for people age 55 and older because many people in this age category retire before becoming eligible for Medicare or find themselves "downsized" out of a job. These people are the least likely segment of our population to be able to obtain affordable coverage in the individual health insurance marketplace. And, with the aging of the baby boom generation, this is a quickly growing segment of our population. In 1999, there were 23.1 million Americans in this age group. This number is expected to grow to 35 million by 2010 and to 42.5 million by 2020.

For these people, we would enable them to extend COBRA coverage until they become eligible for Medicare. This provision would provide them with stable health insurance until they become covered by Medicare. The bill recognizes the fact that this age group is more expensive to insure and compensates business accordingly by increasing the cost of participation to the worker from 102% of the premium to 125% of the premium cost if they maintain COBRA more than the standard of five years put forth in the first provision of our legislation.

Finally, we are especially excited about the provision that provides a new, refundable tax credit worth 50% of the premium costs. This tax credit is vitally important because health insurance is expensive! We are requiring people to pay 102% of the premium and these are often people with no job—or seriously underemployed for a temporary period of time. Overall premiums for health insurance have an average annual cost of $2400 for an individual and more than $6000 for a family.

The tax credit will defray some of the otherwise potentially unaffordable new cost forced on workers who wish to take advantage of the COBRA continuation option. They will still be responsible for much more of the cost than under a comprehensive employer-provided health plan in which the employer pays 80% and the employer pays 20%. But, this tax credit will enable many more people to take advantage of the opportunity to remain insured until another employer-provided plan becomes available to them.

Many of our colleagues on the other side of the aisle are enamored of a tax credit approach to solve the problem of the uninsured. Unfortunately, those members refuse to create a marketplace where health insurance would be made affordable and be fairly offered. The beauty of attaching a tax credit to COBRA continuation benefits is that you have guaranteed buy-in to a group health plan with comprehensive benefits that does not underwrite the price of the premium based on an individual's—or their families'—health status.

This bill has something in it for everyone. It builds on the existing COBRA law. It helps people who are between jobs maintain affordable, comprehensive health insurance for themselves and their families. And, it includes the favorite solution put forth by the Republicans to reduce the number of uninsured—a tax credit approach.

Again, we know this bill is no panacea for solving all of the health insurance problems facing our nation. However, it certainly makes dramatic improvements on the status quo.

We look forward to working with our colleagues on both sides of the aisle to enact the COBRA Coverage Extension and Affordability Act and make important strides to help workers maintain affordable, continuous health insurance coverage for themselves and their families.

MEMORIAL TO BOYARSKI FAMILY ESTABLISHED

HON. PAUL E. KANJORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. KANJORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend the law enforcement officers of Luzerne County and other members of the community, including the Hazleton Standard-Speaker, who have worked to establish a memorial to the late Luzerne County Deputy Sheriff Eugene Boyarski and his family.

Deputy Sheriff Boyarski faced threats for doing his job, and when he refused to give in, he and his family were murdered by a firebomb thrown into their home in the middle of the night on February 14, 1976.

The stone memorial will be dedicated next week outside the Luzerne County Courthouse Annex in Hazleton. It will read: "Deputy Sheriff Eugene Boyarski, his wife Lorraine and his family who tragically died in the intentional fire bombing of their home on Feb. 14, 1976, and all the deputy sheriffs from the Greater Hazleton area and Luzerne County who serve their community and elected sheriff with pride and honor."

The ceremony will also include the presentation of the Boyarski Memorial Award, which will be given each year to a law enforcement officer. The first recipient of this award will be State Trooper Thomas McAndrew of Troop N in Hazleton "for his dedication, resourcefulness and tenacity above and beyond the call of duty during the recent Algar/Molina homicide investigation."

Trooper McAndrew certainly deserves this award for his efforts as the lead investigator, spearheading the intensive probe that led to two arrests and convictions. I am honored to have been asked to participate in this solemn ceremony.

Deputy Sheriff Boyarski's memory will also be perpetuated at the county courthouse in Wilkes-Barre with a plaque and a display of photographs and news clippings. In addition to these memorials and the award, a scholarship in his name will help students to pay for the six-month course at Lackawanna Junior College's branch campus in Hazleton that certifies them to become deputies or police officers.

Every day, our law enforcement officers put their lives on the line to protect our communities. Too often we take their service for granted, and I am pleased that Deputy Sheriff Boyarski's courage will continue to be remembered and honored in Luzerne County.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to call to the attention of the House of Representatives these efforts to honor the memory of the Boyarski family, and I commend all those who worked to created this lasting memorial.

CONGRATULATIONS DON AND MARY LOU JACOBS

HON. JAMES A. BARCIA

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. BARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor Don and Mary Lou Jacobs of Bay City, Michigan, as they prepare to celebrate fifty years of marriage and a life-long commitment to each other and their nine children. The Jacobs' dedication and loving relationship serves as an excellent model for their family, friends and neighbors.

Don and Mary Lou met at LaLonde's Ballroom on Center Avenue in Hampton Township, Michigan. After a year and a half of courtship, Don proposed, and Mary Lou accepted. They were married on the twenty-sixth of May, 1951, and their marriage has been blessed with nine wonderful children: Maureen, Marie, Marlene, Donald, Darrell, Michele, Darin, Duane and Marcia. Mary Lou has devoted her life to raising and nurturing the children and providing a stable and supportive family environment. Don had a long and distinguished career in the automobile industry and, in 1988, retired from the UAW International staff giving him more time to spend with Mary Lou, their children and their grandchildren.

In today's society, it is a rare and praiseworthy occasion for a couple to spend fifty years together. Over the years, Don and Mary Lou have had many good times and much happiness to celebrate. Like any strong relationship, they also depended upon each other and their family to overcome some hardships. Their enduring love helped them make it through those times of strife and only served to deepen and enrich the joy of their partnership.

A good marriage is one of life's greatest covenants because it represents a declaration of love, and, as Paul said in his Letter to the Corinthians, "Though I speak with the tongues of men and angels, but do not have love, I am nothing." Don and Mary Lou exemplify the promises outlined in the marriage pledge that so many others have invoked: through sickness and health, for richer or for poorer, their commitment and their love has remained strong.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me in congratulating Don and Mary Lou Jacobs for the strength of their commitment to their family and to each other and in wishing them many future years of happiness.

TRIBUTE TO CYRUS M. "RUSS" JOLLIVETTE

HON. CARRIE P. MEEK

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mrs. MEEK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a man who has dedicated himself to the advancement of higher education and public service, Cyrus M. Jollivette, who is affectionately known as "Russ."

For 24 years, Russ Jollivette has compiled a remarkable record of achievement as the representative of the University of Miami, not only in these halls and in this city, but throughout Florida and the nation. He has announced his decision to leave the University now in further pursuit of his many interests. He leaves at the same time that the University's beloved president, Edward T. Foote, retires after 20 years at this institution. They leave together, two very extraordinary men whose mutual trust, skill, hard work and vision have left a permanent mark on the University and our entire community.

Russ is long-time personal friend and one of the finest men that I know. He has had a remarkable impact on improving the lives of students at U of M and creating new opportunities for dozens of talented students and researchers in fields like biomedical research, international education and development and marine sciences. Through Russ' efforts, the University has secured almost $200 million in federal support for cutting-edge education, training and research objectives. He has worked with me on minority health and education issues, cancer, diabetes and marine research and environmental science issues. His abilities as a problem-solver are legendary. There are very few University representatives who have Russ Jollivette's professionalism, knowledge, commitment judgment and persuasive ability, or who can match his success.

But his achievements do not begin or end with his service to the University. He is a special leader in the world of higher education and public service, and a leader in the African-American community. He understands the meaning of friendship in the truest sense. He comes from a prominent S. Florida family with a long history in our

Russ Jollivette's name is synonymous with academic service and excellence. He holds a Masters in Business Administration and a law degree. At the University of Miami, he served for more than two decades as Vice President for Government Relations, as the Secretary of the University, as Director of Public Affairs, Director of the Foundation and Corporate Relations, and, for many years, as the Executive Assistant to the President. In recognition of this service to the University, Russ was just awarded the 2001 Alumnus of the Year Award. Standing ovations at that ceremony and at meetings of the University's Executive Committee of the Board of Trustees reflect the depth of feeling and respect for him throughout the University.

In Florida, Russ Jollivette's reputation for public service and civic activities go well beyond U of M. Russ helped to shape the Florida Education as its Board Chairman and a Director—a fund dedicated to the advancement of African-American students with special promise to seek advanced degrees in many fields. He has served as a Chairman and Trustee for the Council for the Advancement and Support of Education (CASE) and as a Chairman and Trustee of the Public Health Trust of Miami-Dade County. He serves as Board Member and Secretary-Treasurer of the Miami Coalition for a Safe and Drug-Free Community and a member of the Orange Bowl Committee. He was a Board member of The Dade County Foundation and We Will Rebuild coalition following the devastation of Hurricane Andrew. The list goes on and on.

Mr. Speaker, the University of Miami; the Florida Congressional Delegation and the Congress; the world of higher education and countless young lives have been well-served by Russ Jollivette. I know my colleagues join me in thanking him and wishing him well. We can hardly wait to see what he will accomplish next.

MILITARY PAY

HON. CASS BALLENGER

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. BALLENGER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to restore a small measure of balance to the way military retired pay is handled during a divorce.

Under the Uniformed Services Former Spouses Protection Act, courts were given the authority to divide military retirement pay as property. This has resulted in certain injustices to many divorced military retirees. Chief among them is the fact that former spouses continue to receive a share of the retired pay even after one or more re-marriages—unlike other federal agency pensions, such as those of the CIA and Foreign Service, which terminate after a spouse remarries. Moreover, since there is no limitation on when former spouses can seek a division of retired pay, some former spouses seek this action many years after the divorce.

My bill has four principal components addressing problems created by the original legislation. First, it would terminate payments made as a division of property from retired pay upon remarriage of the former spouse. Second, it would require computation of the former spouse's portion of retired pay based on the servicemember's rank and year of military service at the time of divorce, not at the time of retirement. Third, it would limit the period of time after divorce in which a former spouse may seek a division of retired pay. Fourth, it would protect any veterans' disability compensation from division with the former spouse, which was originally intended, but has either been circumvented or ignored.

I urge my colleagues to join me in seeking equity for military retirees by cosponsoring this bill.

MEMORIAL DAY IS A DAY TO REMEMBER THE SACRIFICE

HON. DAN BURTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, Memorial Day was established in 1868 to pay tribute to individuals who have made the ultimate sacrifice to the United States and their families. The men and women of the armed services of today and yesterday took an oath to uphold and protect the constitution against all enemies foreign and domestic. Those who served in the Army, Air Force, Navy, Coast Guard, and Marine Corps have been willing to lay their lives on the line to keep this greatest nation on the earth free. We must never forget the importance of this oath and this sacrifice.

Last year, when Public Law No. 106-579 was signed into law, we reaffirmed the importance of remembering and renewing the legacy of Memorial Day. We as a nation need to reclaim memorial Day as the sacred and noble event the day was intended to be. We can do this by taking greater strides to domestic appreciation for those loyal people of the United States whose values, represented by their sacrifices, are critical to the future of the United States. As a Government, we have a responsibility to raise awareness of and respect for the national heritage, and to encourage citizens to dedicate themselves to the values and principles for which those heroes of the United States died.

As part of this reaffirmation, Congress and the President called on the people of the United States to pause at 3:00 p.m. on Memorial Day to observe a National Moment of Remembrance. By doing so we honor the men and women of the United States who died in the pursuit of freedom and peace.

Memorial weekend has become the signal in this country that summer has begun. In Indianapolis this weekend we have the great Indy 500 race and festivities. It is a great weekend for Hoosiers. I hope that each American as we go about our holiday weekend will at the very least remember to take that moment on Monday and pause at 3:00 p.m. for a moment of remembrance through prayer, quiet reflection, or meditation.

We have been blessed this week to have a great media focus on the heroes of our armed services. Last Sunday night the James Keach Movie, "Submerged" aired on network television. This movie portrayed the heroics of the submariners of our early Navy and told the true story of raising a submarine and saving many of its crew. This Friday the movie "Pearl Harbor" will premier in theaters across the nation. I am pleased that these artists have used their talents and efforts to share with the world the stories that are such a vital component of our nation's history.

I am also pleased that we are preparing a sixty-year remembrance event at Pearl Harbor. We are fortunate in the 107th Congress to have heroes among us. The following are members of the House and Senate who served in the armed services during World War II. From the House of Representatives: CASS BALLENGER, JOHN D. DINGELL, BENJAMIN A. GILMAN, RALPH M. HALL, AMO HOUGHTON, HENRY J. HYDE, JOE MOAKLEY, RALPH REGULA, Norman Sisisky, JOE SKEEN, and BOB STUMP. From the Senate: DANIEL K. AKAKA, JESSE HELMS, ERNEST F. HOLLINGS, DANIEL K. INOUE, TED STEVENS, STROM THURMOND, and JOHN WARNER.

As we go about remembering those who died in service, I hope we will also remember those who are still with us. Each month over 38,000 World War II veterans die. Our veterans are our nation's heroes. Whether a Private or a General, combat veteran who served on the front lines, a nurse in a MASH unit, or the quartermaster who was stateside during war—our veterans deserve to be remembered and honored by our country and by each of us. We need to make sure every eligible veteran who goes to a Veterans Administration (VA) Hospital or clinic for medical care is treated with compassion and respect and gets good medical care. We also need to make sure that we do a better job with those whose conditions mean their care is palliative and not curative.

During a Government Reform Committee hearing in October 1999, we learned that the VA had an initiative to improve their hospice programs. We heard from such experts as Dr. Ira Byock and Dr. Judith Salerno as well as Dannon Brinkley who founded Compassion in Action—a non-profit foundation that trains hospice volunteers to serve in VA hospitals. I am pleased that in four short years this organization has been able to train 4,000 hospice volunteers who last year provided 27,000 hours of service to veterans.

Americans who volunteer through Compassion in Action, the American Legion, the Paralyzed Veterans Association, and the many other volunteer service organizations at the VA are also our heroes. Many of these volunteers are veterans as well and continue to serve their country as brigades of volunteers without whom our VA hospitals could not function. I am pleased that our President is continuing the legacy of the Thousand Points of Light by rejuvenating the call to volunteerism and compassion through service.

NATIONAL SAFE BOATING WEEK

HON. CORRINE BROWN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Ms. BROWN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, this is National Safe Boating Week. In the year 2000, over 72 million Americans participated in recreational boating activities. However, between 700 and 800 Americans will be killed in recreational boating accidents this year.

It will take a continued effort by State Boating Law Administrators, Manufacturers, boating safety educators, and the many other organizations involved in boating to decrease the number of Americans killed every year on our waterways.

Today, I would like to ask the cellular telephone industry in the United States to join this effort by designating "CG" as the emergency response number that boaters can use in an emergency to make free calls to the nearest Coast Guard unit.

Over the past decade, more and more Americans are carrying cellular telephones wherever they are—including on their boat. I am pleased to recognize that companies such as Verizon and Alltel wireless allow many of their customers to call the Coast Guard using *CG. However, the use of *CG is not universal. For example, in Woods Hole, Massachusetts, *CG will reach the Coast Guard if you are using a Verizon phone. However, if you happen to be using a Sprint Cellular phone you reach a recording that says "invalid code entered"; on Cellular One and Nextel you get "call cannot be completed as dialed." Even within a singular cellular telephone company, designation of *CG for emergency communications is not universal. For example, Verizon has *CG connections in Seattle and Massachusetts, but not in Norfolk, Virginia.

Mr. Speaker, when a boater is in distress they need to be able to reach the local Coast Guard unit as soon as possible. They may not have a VHF radio on board and the only way to reach the Coast Guard is by using their cellular telephone. Time is of the essence, and they can't wait to go through the operator to reach the nearest Coast Guard unit.

Today I would like to call on the U.S. cellular phone industry to designate *CG as the nationwide phone number for boaters to reach the Coast Guard during emergencies using cell phones and to ask them to program their networks to route these calls to the nearest appropriate Coast Guard facility. They too can join the coalition of people in the United States striving to save boaters lives.

The Coast Guard has a template agreement that they have been successfully implemented around the country. Once all of these companies are on board, we can initiate a boating safety campaign to educate the boating public about the universal access to *CG during emergencies.

Please help us save lives by establishing a national *CG system.

Mr. Speaker, I submit for the record an article about Verizon Wireless use of *CG in the Seattle area.

VERIZON WIRELESS LINKS BOATERS TO COAST GUARD

DON'T CAST OFF WITHOUT YOUR WIRELESS PHONE

SEATTLE, May 2 /PRNewswire/—With the official arrival of a new boating season on May 5, Verizon Wireless reminds boaters that it offers its customers a direct connection to the U.S. or Canadian Coast Guard by dialing *CG (*24) from their Verizon Wireless phone. There is no access fee to use *CG. Airtime is deducted from customers' calling plan bundle.

"While VHF-FM maritime channel 16 should be used as the primary means for reporting an emergency," said Kelly DeLaney, Verizon Wireless regional president, "our extensive marine coverage gives boaters another reliable means of communication while on the water that increases convenience and enhances safety and security. Boaters can use *CG to get help if there is an emergency, or to pass along information about a navigational hazard that could endanger boats."

Just as wireless users are encouraged to exercise caution when driving and dialing onshore, boaters should keep safety in mind when navigating and dialing.

To recognize National Safe Boating Week, May 19 through May 25, Verizon Wireless asks all boaters to think "safety," by following these tips:

Safe boating is your first priority. Make sure your phone is positioned where it is easy to see and reach.

Use the speed dialing features on your phone to program frequently called numbers.

Let your wireless network's voice mail pick up your calls when you're unable to answer the phone. If you're heading into a navigational hazard, it's easy to retrieve your messages later.

Use your wireless phone to notify those on shore of your whereabouts and destination.

2001

SPEECH OF

HON. MIKE ROGERS

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union had under consideration the bill (H.R. 1) to close the achievement gap with accountability, flexibility, and choice, so that no child is left behind:

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, as the father of two young children in the public school system, I have a vested interest in supporting any measures that will further strengthen the current system. Ensuring that our children have access to every educational opportunity necessary to achieve is my top priority in Congress.

The provisions contained in H.R. 1 will give states and local school districts the flexibility and decision-making authority they need to address the individual needs of their students and teachers. Paperwork mandates and regulations force states and local school districts to sacrifice student achievement in order to comply with bureaucracy; thus, taking time away from teaching. Giving state and local officials additional flexibility helps them tailor programs to more closely meet students' unique needs and priorities—whether it be through additional focus on teacher training and professional development or additional funding for technology needs or class size reduction. I firmly believe that local school districts, not Washington, know best what the needs of our children are and although the federal government can and should play an important role in our education system, it should not be the guiding force.

In Michigan and throughout the country, an alarming number of children enter school without the language and literacy foundation necessary to succeed in school. Many children are incapable of deciphering that letters make up words and that words carry meaning. This problem spans all socioeconomic backgrounds and leads to children entering school behind their classmates before they even get started. Therefore, I am extremely pleased by the enormous step forward H.R. 1 takes toward focusing on effective, proven methods of reading instruction and triples federal literacy funding from the present $300 million to $900 million in 2002. Furthermore, this legislation authorizes $5 billion over the next five years on reading programs for children between kindergarten and third grade.

At a time when our economy is slowing and we are facing fiscal restraint here in Washington, our commitment to funding education has never been stronger. H.R. 1 provides for a $4.6 billion increase, which represents an eight percent increase over current year funding for K–12 programs. This is funding that is primarily directed toward the economically disadvantaged. While dollars alone are not the answer, combined with greater local autonomy over how those dollars can be spent, allows for targeted efforts on behalf of every school in my district. This could mean an increase in teacher salaries for the Lansing School District or extra computers for the Saline School District. Ensuring our school districts have the necessary resources to be successful is a positive step in the right direction.

I am voting yes on H.R. 1 because it provides school districts with greater flexibility, a strong focus on reading initiatives and increased funding for quality programs. After listening to the constituents of my district, I am confident that these are reforms that we can all support for the benefit of our children's future.

STAMP HONORING PAUL LEROY ROBESON

HON. BOBBY L. RUSH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. RUSH. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce House Concurrent Resolution 143, expressing the sense of the Congress that the U.S. Postal Service issue a commemorative postage stamp honoring Paul Leroy Robeson. Sixty-six of my colleagues have joined me in support of this resolution.

Paul Robeson, a famous African-American athlete, singer, actor, and advocate for the civil rights of people around the world was born on April 9, 1898 in Princeton, New Jersey. After receiving his degree from Columbia Law School in 1923, Paul Robeson left the legal profession for a career in the arts. Paul Robeson is well known for his inspiring performances in musicals, such as Show Boat, and theatrical performances, such as Shakespeare's Othello. With his distinctive deep baritone voice, Paul Robeson left audiences around the world captivated.

Paul Robeson's brilliant on-stage performances were second only to his commitment to eradicating racial and social injustice in the United States and around the world. Paul Robeson used his oratory skills and knowledge of 25 languages to combat racial inequality in this country and around the world. Because of his stance, Paul Robeson was ostracized and disparaged by many.

Even at the risk to his own safety and professional stature, Mr. Robeson stood up against racial bigotry during a time when segregation was legal in America and lynching was common place.

Paul Robeson never took the easy road in life. Where he could have easily focused solely on his career, Paul Robeson chose to stand up in defiance of the unjust social practices of his time. Paul Robeson forced America to look into a mirror at itself and confront the racial injustice commonly accepted during his lifetime.

In honor of his undying efforts and enduring personal sacrifice, I have introduced this legislation and urge all of my colleagues to join me in this tribute to Paul Robeson.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. DOUG BEREUTER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, on May 23, 2001, a visit to the Vice President's residence away from Capital Hill caused me to unavoidably miss rollcall vote no. 146 (motion to instruct conferees on H.R. 1836, the Economic Growth and Tax Relief Reconciliation Act). Had I been present I would have voted "no."

TRIBUTE TO CHARLES NEWTON
COOK OF HOLLYWOOD, ALABAMA

HON. ROBERT E. (BUD) CRAMER, JR.

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. CRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the long and fruitful life of Mr. Charley Cook, of Hollywood, Alabama, an extraordinary man whose one hundred and five years have been marked by his love of country, family and God.

Mr. Cook was born in Hollywood, Alabama on May 28, 1896. When he was 21, he volunteered for the Navy and served in the Navy during World War I until 1919 making three trips to French waters. He is believed to be the last living WWI Veteran in Alabama. Mr. Cook also served on the Battleship Utah, which the Japanese sunk at Pearl Harbor.

Mr. Cook's life reads like a chronicle of this nation's history. He has witnessed Babe Ruth hit his legendary home runs from Yankee Stadium and been in the audience of a vaudeville show starring Eddie Cantor and George Burns. When he finished his service time, he returned to Hollywood, Alabama maintaining his garden until 1995. He voluntarily quit driving at age 99.

I would like to enclose words from his "Armed Guard Detail" certificate, "Members of the Armed Guards . . . may well be proud of this duty. The efficient and courageous performance of this duty, replete with successful encounters with hostile submarines, will insure its indelible inscription in the history of the United States Navy." We can never afford to forget the victories and sacrifices of Mr. Cook's generation lest we take for granted the precious freedoms we enjoy every minute of every day.

On behalf of the people of Alabama's Fifth Congressional District, I join them in celebrating the extraordinary life of this brave soldier. I send him and his family my best wishes on this special birthday reception this Sunday at the Veterans Hall in Scottsboro. I wish Mr. Cook a happy and healthy 105th year.

SPEECH OF

HON. ROBERT A. UNDERWOOD

OF GUAM

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union had under consideration the bill (H.R. 1) to close the achievement gap with accountability, flexibility, and choice, so that no child is left behind:

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I rise today to express my concerns and to urge my colleagues to consider the children who will be left behind on H.R. 1. The President's Education Plan to "Leave No Child Behind" is woven into the language of H.R. 1, which is our blueprint for elementary and secondary education in this country. While I support many of the initiatives in this legislation, I must raise again the reality that the children living in U.S. insular areas like Guam, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, and the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands will be left behind in this reauthorization bill.

While H.R. 1 addresses the needs of children living in rural areas, the needs of American Indian and Alaska Native children, the needs of children with Limited English Proficiency, the needs of children of military families, it fails to begin addressing the needs of children living in the insular areas. And, although the insular areas have a unique status under Federal law that requires special policies to serve the educational needs of children, there is no Federal education policy that focuses on the specific and unique needs of insular area school systems.

It is difficult for insular area educational systems to compete for Federal funding distributed by competitive grants because schools lack the personnel needed to prepare grant application and the resources to higher specialists in the writing of Federal grant proposals. They are also faced with unique challenges in hiring and retaining qualified administrators and certified school teachers. This is alarmingly the case in American Samoa where 77 percent of school teachers are uncertified.

Children living in insular areas rank among the lowest in the nation in educational achievement. In particular, the jurisdictions of Guam and the Virgin Islands rank among the lowest in the nation in NAEP scores. Consequently, the high school drop out rates of children living in the insular areas are among the highest in the Nation.

Insular area educational systems face other challenges such as geographical barriers, high unemployment rates, shrinking economies, aging buildings which are strained by the acceleration of weathering caused by tropical storms and typhoons, high costs of importing and providing equipment and supplies, and a host of other limited resources.

If the goal is indeed to leave no child behind in education, then Congress and the Federal Government must work to ensure that no child is left behind, whether they reside in the states or the territories. The current language of H.R. 1 neglects to take into account the special needs of children living in the territories and the special challenges insular area educational systems must undergo to provide quality education in the insular areas.

As the Delegate from Guam to the U.S. House of Representatives, and a life-long educator who taught and served in the administration of public high schools and later served as the Academic Vice President of the University of Guam, I have always advocated for improvements in the manner that federal policy is developed by the Federal Government in its treatment of the insular areas.

The insular areas are generally included in most national education programs, but mostly as afterthoughts. As a result, educators in the insular areas must follow a patchwork system of funding arrangements, varying from state shares to special formulas for outlying areas, in order to obtain needed and fair funding of federal program resources.

I am pleased that we will be included in most of the increases, including the President's proposal to increase spending by $5 billion on reading programs for Kindergarten to 3rd grade. And, I am particularly pleased that local school districts will be given greater flexibility to transfer up to 50 percent of the Federal education dollars they receive through ESEA programs. I am also pleased that the bill will help states and local schools with their development of annual reading and math assessments for students in 3rd through 8th grade and that there will not be a uniform ruler to measure all achievement because one size does not fit all. However, I remain concerned that the over-reliance on standardized testing as the only measure of educational success might only lead to failure. In a place like Guam, standardized testing as a single measure can be particularly misleading, therefore, additional measures should be employed.

I have long been an advocate for establishing a Federal educational policy for the insular areas that would help to bring consistency to their treatment throughout H.R. 1. In the absence of such policy, I have worked to develop language and legislation to extend the opportunities provided to all Americans to those living in the insular areas. Thus, I proposed an amendment to H.R. 1 which provides the framework for Federal education policy to the insular areas and calls for the reestablishment of the Territorial Assistance Program to provide teacher training to help students graduate from high schools in the insular areas. Unfortunately, this amendment was struck down along with more than a hundred other amendments proposed for this deliberation today.

I am here before you to urge your consideration of the special needs of children living in the insular areas. The Federal Government has recognized that special attention must be given to the challenging circumstances of insular area educational systems. It is my hope that Congress will work to resolving these longstanding issues which impede the delivery of education to children living in the insular areas. Why should our educators be left to searching for information in footnotes and obscure references to find the policies which apply to them?

We need to work in concert to level the playing field for all American children in the states and in the territories. I hope my colleagues will join in supporting my legislation to ensure that no American child is left behind in our national education programs no matter where they live, and urge support for the inclusion of this policy in any final agreement of H.R. 1.

IN RECOGNITION OF ANTONIO
MEUCCI

HON. ELIOT L. ENGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring to the attention of my colleagues the efforts of Professor Basilio Catania of Turin, Italy. Professor Catania is the retired director general of Italy's Central Telecommunications Laboratory, a distinguished scientist, holder of the European Union's first Telecommunications Prize, holder of Italy's internationally acclaimed Marconi Prize. Following years of meticulous research, Professor Catania is now trying to bring to light the merits of Mr. Antonio Meucci, who claimed that he and not Alexander Graham Bell invented the telephone. In October 2000, at New York University, Professor Catania presented "Antonio Meucci, Inventor of the Telephone: Unearthing the Legal and Scientific Proofs."

Had Mr. Meucci been able to afford the ten-dollar fee to extend his 1871 caveat from the United States Patent Office beyond 1874, the Bell patents could never have been issued and we would have a very different vocabulary today in discussing telecommunications issues.

The fight over who actually should hold the patent for the telephone and succeeding inventions dates back to the earliest days of the telecommunications industry. The federal government even played a direct roll. In 1885, the Meucci claim was presented before Secretary of Interior Lucius Lamar, who at the time had jurisdiction over the Patent Office. Fifty affidavits and the exhibition of two dozen of Meucci's telephone models were part of the presentation. One of the affidavits was the translation into English of Mr. Meucci's Memorandum Book, in which he kept the notes on his various experiments on the telephone as far back as 1862. A drawing in the Memorandum Book shows that Mr. Meucci had discovered the inductive loading of long distance telephone lines many years before the Bell Company. It was also found that Mr. Meucci should have been credited with other firsts, such as call signaling, the anti-side tone circuit, and the first measures to optimize the structure of telephone lines.

The outcome of the hearings led to a recommendation to proceed against the Bell Company. Unfortunately, little attention has been paid to this important trial brought by the Department of Justice in January 1887 United States v. Bell Telephone Company and Alexander Graham Bell. This lawsuit was instituted by the federal government against Bell to strip him of his patents for fraud and misrepresentation. Appealed on demurrer to the Supreme Court, it was determined by the High Court that a viable and meritorious contention against Bell had been raised, and the case was remanded for trial. The record of the trial proceeding was never printed and now resides in storage with the National Archives and Records Administration.

Interestingly, the hearings before the Interior Secretary coincided with a lawsuit brought by the Bell Company against Mr. Meucci for patent infringement. Sadly, none of proceedings at Interior were made available during the patent infringement trial.

MUNICIPAL GAS SUPPLY ACT OF 2001

HON. MAC COLLINS

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today to correct a problem created by the IRS that has interfered with the ability of municipal gas systems to enter into long-term prepaid contracts to obtain natural gas for their citizens. I am joined today by 20 of my colleagues who share my great concern for this issue.

The approximately 1,000 publicly owned gas distribution systems in the United States comprise about 5 percent of the market. They are primarily located in small towns and rural communities. In the last 15 years there have been major changes in the natural gas industry that have increased their exposure to the great uncertainties of the natural gas market. In 1985 the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission "FERC" began deregulating the delivery of natural gas. In 1993 FERC began requiring that pipelines "unbundle" their services to customers. This meant that municipal gas systems could no longer purchase natural gas supplies on a reliable and regulated basis from interstate natural gas pipelines. This fundamental change in the marketplace meant that for the first time municipal gas systems had to acquire reliable gas supplies and transport on their own in a deregulated marketplace. In response, many formed joint action agencies, as contemplated in the FERC restructuring, to acquire and manage the delivery of gas.

In today's natural gas markets, long-term prepaid supply arrangements are the most reliable means for municipal gas systems to obtain an assured supply of natural gas. To fund prepaid supply contracts, the municipality or the joint action agency issues tax-exempt bonds. These contracts contain stiff penalties if the supplier fails to perform making this the most reliable gas supply that municipal gas agencies can purchase. Until August of 1999, joint action agencies entered into prepayment supply contracts with gas suppliers to obtain a long-term (e.g., 10-year) supply of gas.

In August 1999, the IRS published a request for comment that has effectively prevented municipal gas systems from using their tax-exempt borrowing authority to fund the purchase of long-term, prepaid supplies of natural gas for their citizens. The IRS questioned whether the purchase of a commodity, such as natural gas, under a prepaid contract financed by tax-exempt bonds has a principal purpose of earning an investment return, in which case the bonds would run afoul of the arbitrage rules of the Internal Revenue Code. The IRS has not issued any guidance following the August 1999 request for comment.

Under the Internal Revenue Code, tax-exempt bonds may not be used to raise proceeds that are then used to acquire "investment-type property" having a higher yield than the bonds. Governmental bonds that violate this arbitrage restriction do not qualify for tax-exempt status. Treasury regulations provide that investment-type property includes certain prepayments for property or services "if a principal purpose for prepaying is to receive an investment return." But, "a prepayment does not give rise to investment-type property if . . . the prepayment is made for a substantial business purpose other than investment return and the issuer has no commercially reasonable alternative to the prepayment. . . ." A very similar standard is used to determine whether a prepayment transaction is treated as a loan for purposes of the private loan financing test. If a transaction is considered a private loan financing, the bonds are treated as private activity bonds. Although municipal gas systems clearly have a "substantial business purpose" for entering into prepayment transactions and "no commercially reasonable alternative," the failure of the IRS to issue any guidance following its August 1999 request for comment has eliminated the most efficient tool available to public gas systems to secure long term supplies of natural gas.

The IRS has essentially acted against municipal gas systems without going through any of the administrative procedures required for agency action. It has not issued any regulations, ruling or other guidance; it has simply put out a request for comment that has effectively prevented the issuance of any tax-exempt obligations to fund prepaid contracts for natural gas.

The legislation we are introducing today would clarify the law, both with respect to the arbitrage rules and the private loan financing rules, to remove the confusion created by the IRS.

This country is now facing an energy crisis. All across the nation the price of natural gas has been at record levels as purchasers have scrambled to obtain an assured supply. Meanwhile, by requesting comment and then failing to act, the IRS has prevented small communities from using their tax-exempt borrowing authority to obtain a long-term, assured supply of competitively priced natural gas. This problem must be addressed as part of comprehensive energy legislation that Congress will soon consider.

TRIBUTE TO CANDICE A. NEAL OF EVA, ALABAMA

HON. ROBERT E. (BUD) CRAMER, JR.

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. CRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I submit into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following essay written by a bright young lady from North Alabama, Miss Candice Neal. The essay titled "The Constitution: A Fantastic Journey" was recently selected as the winner of the 2001 American Legion National High School Oratorical Contest. I would like to submit her patriotic words for the RECORD.

"THE CONSTITUTION: A FANTASTIC JOURNEY"

Attention time travelers this is your final boarding call for flight U.S. 1-7-8-7. Congratulations you have selected one of our more popular destinations, The Beginning of American Government. Today, you will experience some of the more dramatic events in our nation's history. Flight 1-7-8-7 is a non-stop flight, back in time, to the creation of the U.S. Constitution. The flight crew has requested that you remain seated with your personal liberties securely fastened. When the captain is certain that you are not in danger she will illuminate the "ratification light" indicating that you may move about the cabin freely. As we prepare for take-off I will remind you that this is a non-smoking flight, and in keeping with today's destination, federal law prohibits the violation of anyone's inalienable rights.

Please look in the seat back pockets in front of you, to review today's agenda. We begin our journey with a basic knowledge and understanding of the Constitution and how it was created. In the second phase of this adventure, we will learn how to responsibly engage in our constitutional rights. And, finally you will discover what it means to become a part of history, by participating in this government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

We've been cleared for takeoff, so please direct your attention to the windows on the left side of the cabin. You will note instances in recent history, in which rulers and dictators have taken away people's personal freedoms. There's Kosovo, Bosnia and Tianenmen Square.

Make sure your seat belts are securely fastened. We are about to enter a turbulent time in American History—the defense of democracy—There's Desert Storm, now Pearl Harbor and our final stop, the Revolutionary War. This is where our journey begins. . . .

What you might not realize is that the Constitution is actually our third form of government. It was here during the Revolutionary War when our fight for freedom began. The American Colonies were first forced to live under the reign of England. From 1775 until 1783 the American Colonies fought for their independence. Fast forward to 1781. You'll notice that even before the fighting was over, our second form of government, the Articles of Confederation, was adopted. It is obvious to us now, as time travelers, that these young colonies would require much more structure than the Articles of Confederation had to offer. Here we see the lack of a central government to levy taxes and enforce laws. We see states minting their own currency and imposing tariffs on out-of-state goods. We see economic depression and political wandering.

We now move forward to 1787, please do not disturb the 55 men who are meeting in this old Philadelphia state house. They are statesmen, patriots, each with their own ideas about how this new government should be organized. Some of them are states' rights advocates. Many of them are federalists. But you will notice that one man stands out in the crowd. His name? James Madison. And he is presenting the Virginia Plan to his fellow delegates. They will soon refer to the plan as a "political masterpiece," and in the next 5 months, it will serve as the foundation of our Constitution. By 1789, all the states had ratified and approved this new form of government. This unusual document was the first written, national constitutional since ancient times. It was also the first to set up what was called the federal system. Under this system, sovereign power comes from the people, for the good of the people.

The Founders attempted to create a form of government that would be stable, but would also allow for change. You see, in a sense, the Founding Fathers were time travelers too; they were looking to the future, planning ahead, and forming a basic framework to endure for all time. It is a document written for "we the people" and that means that "we the people" have a job to do!

Fast forward to April 1999. An issue of the USA Today Newsview, states that one of the first things that come to mind when Americans are asked what they think about the United States and its government is "freedom". Yet according to current public opinion research fewer than 15% of Americans can name the freedom of the press and one of the rights protected under the First Amendment. And little more than half of Americans know that there are three forms of government. You see, time travelers, with freedom also comes responsibility—the responsibility to understand and defend the Constitution.

James Madison once said, "The people who are the authors of this blessing must also be its guardians." Today more than ever before we witness people and organizations testing the bounds of their Constitutional rights. From tabloids that slander high profile figures, to hate groups who use their misunderstanding of freedom to infringe upon other's inalienable rights, we are constantly called upon to defend and uphold our constitution. As such, we must be able to use our privileges responsibly. In words of Benjamin Franklin, "we have a Republic, only if we can keep it!"

And now, as we make our way back to the, 21st Century, I will remind you that this flight is interactive—meaning it is not enough to simply understand our constitution and to use our rights responsibly. Clearly, this travel back in time has taught us that our duties as citizens also carry the obligation to participate in our government.

Long after our Founding Fathers penned the last words of the Constitution, the amendment process ensured their continued involvement. You will see what I mean, by looking out the windows on the right side of the aircraft: here we see that The Bill Rights was added to the Constitution in 1791. In 1865 the 13th amendment abolished slavery and in 1868 the 14th amendment outlined the rights of all citizens. Meeting the changing needs of a growing country, however, had been known to cause slight turbulence in our return flight. Therefore, in the event that we experience any threat to ourselves and our posterity any one of the 27 amendments, will drop from the overhead compartments to ensure our domestic tranquility.

The amendment process is not the only way that we as citizens can participate in our government. What we have witnessed today should force us out of complacency and self-centeredness and put us in touch with a greater reality. Robert Kennedy made it popular, but George Bernard Shaw said it long ago: "Some people see things as they are and ask, 'Why?' I prefer to see things as they might be, and ask 'Why not?'" That is what the framers of our constitution had in mind so long ago. Our participation in that process in the 21st Century is essential to ensure that the Constitution continues to withstand the many and varied assaults from those who criticize it, misinterpret it, or challenge it.

We can begin participating in small ways such as reading a daily newspaper or weekly newsmagazine. Then, we will begin participating in bigger ways such as writing letters to public officials, investigating the qualifications of political candidates, and exercising our right to vote. So you see, even in little ways, we must take a more active role in our government—that, time travelers, is the real journey!

Our Founding Fathers, in the words of Justice Hugo Black, "... dreamed of a country where the mind and spirit of man would be free; where there would be no limits to inquiry; where men would be free to explore the unknown and to challenge the most deeply rooted beliefs and principles. . . ."

Today, on flight U.S. 1-7-8-7, we have traveled back in time to the formation of The Constitution of the United States. Our itinerary included a basic knowledge and understanding of the constitution; and appeal to engage in our rights responsibly; and finally, a call to participate in our government.

Here in the 21st Century, the flight crew tells me that we have been cleared for landing. We have people on hand waiting to assist you in your efforts to continue the good work of our Founding Fathers. Remember what you have experienced today is much more than a fantastic journey in to the past, it is a reminder of your responsibility for the future.

HONORING SAM CAUDILL COMMUNITY CONTRIBUTIONS

HON. SCOTT McINNIS

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. McINNIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to recognize a man that has made numerous contributions to his community as well as the United States as a whole. Mr. Sam Caudill served his country in the Office of Strategic Services (OSS) during World War II, and since has served the community of Aspen, Colorado as a leading architect and historian. For his life of service and adventure, I would now like to take this opportunity to honor him.

Sam started his illustrious career on a mission for the Office of Strategic Services to China in 1945 to teach guerilla warfare to Chinese soldiers so that they would be able to defend themselves if the Japanese attacked. Although Sam did not realize it at the time, this type of work was the beginning of what was to become the most extensive and complex intelligence network in the world—the CIA. At the age of 21 Sam volunteered to be a mule packer for the American guerilla fighters. Already fighting the Japanese, he had no idea that he would be presented with the opportunity to help start a new wave of national defense.

Upon finishing his duty in the army, Sam returned to Cornell University to complete his education. After receiving his degree Sam returned to Colorado to make his mark on the skyline of Aspen. Following the lead of Frank Lloyd Wright, Sam has always strived to create buildings that grow out of the environment. Sam was awarded for his unique design of Aspen High School, which reflects the rolling hill surrounding the school with its rounded shape. He has been commissioned in numerous places throughout the state of Colorado. When people refer to Sam, he is often called "the dean of Aspen architecture."

Sam has also made a significant contribution to preserving wildlife in Colorado. He served on the Colorado Wildlife Commission from 1975 to 1983, and was chairman of the commission in 1978. During this time he has been credited with the law that allows Colorado citizens to apportion part of their tax return to the non-game and endangered species program. He also worked on the state's catch and release trout program. Sam still enjoys the outdoors and tries to hike and fish whenever possible.

An interest in local history has spurred Sam's latest contribution to society. For the last twelve years Sam has been interviewing "old timers" about their lives logging, mining and wrangling here in Colorado. Sam hopes to compile all these stories and photos he has gathered into a book titled, "Colorado—the Wild Years." His love for the old west and his reputation in the Aspen community suggests that Sam may have been born a century too late.

Mr. Speaker, like so many of us, Sam has fallen in love with the natural beauty of Colorado. He has spent his life trying to preserve that magical quality that the untamed mountains of Colorado exude. For this I and the citizens of Colorado are grateful.

REMEMBERING HAROLD BERKE

HON. THOMAS M. REYNOLDS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in remembrance and to pay tribute to Harold Berke of Williamsville, New York.

While Harold Berke is no longer with us, we are blessed that his memory and his achievements live on to this day. Born Harold Berkowitz, he enlisted in the Army Air Corps prior to the start of World War II. Harold achieved the rank of Master Sergeant, and during his service to our nation, invented a device that allowed a single man to lift the tail sections of airplanes for repair and inspection.

Following his graduation from the University at Buffalo, which he attended under the GI Bill, Harold Berke went to work for Bell Aerospace, where, beginning in 1954, he led a group that provided a solution to an engine problem on the X2 rocket. Harold Berke's leadership and expertise were integral to other projects, such as the Agena Engine, Rascal Missile, Minute Man Missile, and the engine that ensured America's astronauts were returned safely from the moon.

Harold Berke's contributions were not limited to engineering and aerospace. A loving husband and father, Harold Berke married the late Leah Rose in 1949. They were the proud parents of two sons, Ronald and Daniel. Together with his sons, Harold Berke built award-winning show cars, including a series of Corvettes, and a 1968 Camaro that won 30 awards in 10 shows.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that this Congress join me in remembrance of Harold Berke's contributions to American rocketry and aerospace, and that we salute him in memoriam for his ability and leadership.

STARK/MOAKLEY COBRA COVERAGE EXTENSION & AFFORDABILITY ACT OF 2001

HON. JOHN JOSEPH MOAKLEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to join with my colleague and good friend PETE STARK (D-CA) today in introducing our legislation the "COBRA Coverage Extension and Affordability Act of 2001." This legislation combines and expands earlier individual legislation that each of us introduced to help extend and improve this provision from the 1986 COBRA bill.

The original COBRA law allows employees who face a covered change in their work status and would otherwise lose their health insurance to continue that same coverage for a period of up to 36 months depending on the situation. Under that law, covered employees would pay up to 102 percent of the cost of their current health insurance plan—the employee and employer costs plus an additional fee to cover administrative expenses. Although the law says the coverage can last up to 36 months in some cases, most coverage is limited to 18 months.

Our bill would change the law in three ways. First, it would allow anyone covered by the COBRA statute to maintain that coverage for up to five years under the existing rules. He or she would still be responsible for the entire cost of the insurance policy plus the 2 percent administrative fee but would not have to face loss of insurance coverage or reduction in benefits while looking for a job with comparable health insurance. Next, it would expand the program to individuals who are over the age of 55 and qualified for COBRA coverage to extend their coverage until they become eligible for Medicare. If they go beyond five years, the cost of the premium would go to 125 percent of the policy to help cover increased health care costs that may occur. Lastly, and perhaps most importantly, the bill provides a 50 percent refundable tax credit of the premium to help offset the cost of this coverage to the individual. This provision will make such coverage far more affordable to those for whom the cost is an economic burden.

In today's changing and challenging job market layoffs and reductions in staffing are becoming increasingly common and employees are forced to change jobs more often. Additionally, many businesses either do not offer health insurance at all, offer coverage that is not as comprehensive as the employee's previous plan, or do not make coverage available until the employee has been on the job for a specified period of time. Furthermore, many job hunters change jobs frequently or take short-term or temporary employment simply to pay the bills while searching for a job that is more suitable to his or her field of expertise. Eighteen months often is not long enough for many individuals to find employment that offers comparable coverage.

However, the cost under this bill, though generally far less than acquiring private health insurance on the open market, can still be a substantial expense or even a roadblock to the employee. The bill's 50 percent tax credit for premium costs would greatly reduce that financial burden. And, most importantly, the individual would be able to continue the same policy with the same coverage. This becomes particularly important if that person or his or her family has a pre-existing condition that needs specific care or anticipates an upcoming medical need such as surgery or pregnancy. Continuity of care can be extremely important and in some cases even life-saving. While the recently enacted Health Insurance Portability Act allows individuals losing their coverage to obtain health insurance without bias with regard to a pre-existing condition, it does not guarantee the same plan coverage and it does not guarantee coverage at a comparable cost. Our bill does.

This bill is not the only solution to our nation's growing number of uninsured Americans. But it will help protect many of our nation's workers who face losing health insurance coverage due to job loss. It is not always possible to know if or when we will need health care either for ourselves or our families. But when we are faced with a debilitating illness, a serious accident, or even a joyous event like an upcoming birth, our main concern shouldn't be the cost and whether or not our insurance will be adequate. Please join with Rep. STARK and me in supporting this legislation.

PEARL HARBOR

HON. JACK QUINN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. QUINN. Mr. Speaker, as all Americans prepare to celebrate the Memorial Day weekend, I think it is appropriate for all of us to take some time and reflect on the sacrifice that those men and women, past and present, who served our country have made. This weekend, the movie Pearl Harbor will open throughout the Nation. Once again, Americans of all ages will be reminded of this tragedy, as well as the bravery and courage our service men and women demonstrated.

President Franklin Roosevelt declared it, "A day that will live in infamy." In the pre-dawn hours of December 7, 1941, the United States Pacific Fleet was destroyed by a sneak attack of the Japanese Imperial Army. Nearly 2400 military and civilian lives were lost as a result of the surprise attack and more than 1000 were wounded. The attack forced the United States into World War II, and was the first time the United States had been directly attacked since the War of 1812. It is a moment that is forever frozen in our Nation's consciousness.

I have introduced a bill, H.R. 157, that would designate December 7th as a Federal holiday. This legislation would serve as not only a tribute to those men and women who served and lost their lives at Pearl Harbor, but also all those who defended and fought for our Nation during World War II.

This week, Congress gave final approval to the much-anticipated World War II Memorial on the Mall, and this would be a fitting companion.

I hope all Members will join me in celebrating the memory and sacrifice of these brave Americans by co-sponsoring H.R. 157.

CELEBRATING REVEREND CHARLES W. SPRINKLE

HON. CHARLES H. TAYLOR

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. TAYLOR of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to commend and celebrate the life and Golden Anniversary Celebration for Reverend Charles W. Sprinkle who has pastored Gladly Baptist Church in Candler, North Carolina for fifty years.

Reverend Sprinkle was born and reared in Madison County, North Carolina, son and grandson of pastors. He was the sixth child of fourteen, five of whom are also pastors. Following his graduation from Marshall High School, Reverend Sprinkle completed a tour of duty with the Navy.

He was called to preach in October 1950. New Morgan Hill Baptist Church licensed Reverend Sprinkle on June 20, 1951 and ordained him on July 29, 1951. In May 1951, he was asked by Gladly Baptist Church to preach and asked to be their pastor in June of the same year, fully a half a century ago. Reverend Sprinkle remains at Gladly Baptist today.

Pastor Sprinkle says that he received his training with his head buried in the Bible while on his knees. During his half-century ministry, five young men have been called to preach under his stewardship. Referring to these men as "my boys in the gospel," he is very proud of the great work they are doing for the Lord.

As the Gladly Baptist congregation grew, it became necessary to build a new church building in the early 1970s. Due to Pastor Sprinkle's leadership the new brick church they use today was completely paid for in just one year.

In the past fifty years, Pastor Sprinkle has conducted 102 revivals, performed 98 weddings and 361 funerals. Throughout the joys and sorrows, Pastor Sprinkle notes, "I have seen good times and I have seen hard times, but God's grace was always with us. What a great God we serve!"

Reverend Sprinkle credits much of the success of his ministry to his wife, Lois, a faithful teammate for sixty years.

Mr. Speaker, I know that all of my colleagues in the House of Representatives join me in praising Reverend Charles W. Sprinkle for his fifty years of service to Gladly Baptist Church and the Lord.

DOMESTIC SPIRITS TAX EQUITY ACT

HON. MAC COLLINS

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill, along with my colleague, Representative RICHARD NEAL, to end the unequal tax treatment imposed on U.S. produced distilled spirits. At a time when other countries adopt tax laws to favor their own domestic industries, it is ironic that current U.S. tax law favors foreign products at the expense of U.S.-made products. Regrettably, that is the case with respect to distilled spirits. As members of the Committee on Ways & Means, both Mr. NEAL and I have worked for sometime to correct this inequitable situation.

Current law allows wholesalers of imported spirits to defer the federal excise tax ("FET") on such products until they are removed from a custom bonded warehouse for sale to a retailer. In contrast, the FET on U.S. produced spirits is paid "up front" by the distiller, and passed along to the wholesaler when he purchases product. Custom bonded warehouses cannot be used for domestic product, only that imported from another country. This means that the FET on U.S. produced spirits must be carried by the wholesaler as part of his inventory for as long as it takes to sell that product out of his warehouse.

Couple this disparity in time of payment with the fact that distilled spirits are the most highly taxed of all products, and you begin to understand the seriousness of the problem. At $13.50 per proof gallon, the FET represents virtually 40 percent of the average wholesaler's inventory cost. To make matters worse, it takes an average of 60 days to sell this inventory to a retailer. The bottom line is that U.S. tax policy favors the sale of imported spirits and creates a significant financial burden for wholesalers of domestic spirits—most of which are small, family-owned businesses operating within a single state.

For the past ten years, the wholesale tier of the licensed beverage industry has advocated a tax law policy change known as "All-in-Bond." Mr. NEAL and I sponsored the Distilled Spirits Tax Simplification Act, or "All-in-Bond bill", at the beginning of the 106th Congress. Simply put, it would have extended the custom bonded warehouse concept to all spirits, not just imported product. The result would have been to defer payment of the tax on domestic product—just as we do for imported spirits—until it is removed from the warehouse for sale to a retailer.

Given the obvious inequity of current law, the bill attracted the co-sponsorship of 75 of our colleagues from both sides of the aisle. As a consequence, Mr. NEAL and I were successful in attaching the bill to a major tax reduction measure coming out of the Committee on Ways & Means in 1999, which was subsequently approved by this body.

Subsequently, Treasury/BATF raised unwarranted concerns about changing the point of collection. Additionally, distilled spirits suppliers objected because of concerns about a revenue offset provision which was added to the "All-in-Bond" proposal during committee consideration.

In an effort to build a greater consensus, we agreed to drop the provision in conference and go back to the drawing board to develop a better solution to the problem.

The "Domestic Spirits Tax Equity Act" is that better solution.

The purpose of this legislation is to compensate wholesalers for the unequal burden imposed on U.S.-produced distilled spirits under current law. We do so by allowing qualified wholesalers of domestic spirits a prepaid tax adjustment, or "PTA" which is a credit against their annual federal income tax.

The PTA is determined through a simple formula. It is equal to 40 percent of the amount paid for domestically produced spirits, times the IRS' applicable federal rate over a 60-day period. The PTA was crafted with simplicity in mind. The elements of the formula are easily verifiable and understandable by the wholesaler and the IRS, and the formula results in an accurate overall measure of the unequal float costs. In addition, unlike the "All-in-Bond" proposal, this bill does not change the current FET collection system.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join me in this effort to eliminate the unequal tax treatment imposed on U.S. produced distilled spirits. The PTA is a simple and targeted solution, which addresses the problem. I look forward to the passage of this important legislation so that we can ensure our domestic suppliers are not penalized by the tax code.

HONORING THE CAREER OF JERRY BAXTER

HON. SCOTT MCINNIS

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. MCINNIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment to honor a man that has spent much of his life improving the quality of life for others. Mr. Jerry Baxter has spent the last 27 years of his life entertaining the guests at the Bar D Chuckwagon in Durango, Colorado. This year, in the Bar D's 33rd season, Jerry has announced that he will be leaving for a job as a wrangler in Jackson, Wyoming. As he does, I would like to take this opportunity to honor him.

Jerry has contributed to the Durango community his entire life. His friends and family would most likely describe Jerry as a bit of a character. When Jerry was only seventeen he managed to make it on to the Paul Harvey show with his comedic tale of an experience he had as a volunteer firefighter. Jerry gained this honor by starting a fire on his way to fight a fire. On his way to the grass fire in Hermosa, Colorado, Jerry forgot to release the emergency brake, causing the brake pads to catch fire and fall off. This in turn ignited a fire at the Aspen Rose Campground, which exceeded the size of the Hermosa fire, requiring more men to extinguish it.

Jerry will be fondly remembered by the numerous guests who have been privileged to enjoy his show. Jerry's baritone voice is well loved at the chuckwagon and will be greatly missed. The Bar D originally hired Jerry to work in their kitchen, but he quickly became a well-loved voice on the stage. Jerry speaks highly of the community that has shown him such great support over the years. When Jerry's father passed on, and he was brought to tears during his rendition of "How Great Thou Art," the community reached out to this man that they love. While grateful for his friendship, the Durango community will be sorry to see Jerry leave.

Mr. Speaker, the State of Colorado is fortunate to have citizens like Jerry Baxter within one of its communities—someone who is willing to go that extra mile for others. Colleagues, on behalf of the Western Slope of Colorado, we wish Jerry, his wife LaVerna and his children Justin, Shasta, Kyle and Kolt all the best. The Durango community is fortunate to call Jerry a friend.

HONORING AMERICA'S MOST DECORATED COMBAT VETERAN, LT. COL. MATT URBAN

HON. THOMAS M. REYNOLDS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, as our entire nation pauses to honor its fallen heroes, our Memorial Day Observance has long held a special significance in my Congressional district. That's because, in 1865, the village of Waterloo, New York, became the first community in America to set aside a day of remembrance for those who made the ultimate sacrifice in service to their country, and has since been officially recognized as the birthplace of our modern Memorial Day holiday.

Even with this proud history, this year's Memorial Day will have an even greater significance in our area of the country. That's because on Thursday, May 31, 2001, we will pay special tribute to the most decorated combat veteran in American history, Lt. Col. Matt Urban.

When President Jimmy Carter presented Lt. Col. Urban with the Congressional Medal of Honor, 35 years after his heroic feats in World War II, the President described him as "The Greatest Soldier in American history." Born in August of 1919 in Buffalo, New York, Matt Urban received 29 awards and decorations, including seven purple hearts, and the Silver and Bronze Stars. Matt Urban's bravery and valor earned him virtually every combat medal, as well as the nickname "the Gray Ghost," from the German army.

While there are many stories of Matt Urban's feats, his heroism upon the D-Day Invasion is typical of the battlefield leadership he exhibited during his time with the 60th Infantry Regiment, 9th Infantry Division. Then-Lieutenant Urban, despite a broken leg suffered during his landing on Omaha Beach, led an attack on German positions from the top of a tank, which not only saved his men trapped on the beach, but also drove the enemy off their positions and off the beach.

Lt. Col. Matt Urban, an American hero, passed away on March 20, 1995, as a result of complications from a collapsed lung brought on by one of his seven war wounds. He was laid to rest in Arlington National Cemetery, a hero's honor, well-deserved.

Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, May 31, 2001, the man once dubbed "The Hero We Nearly Forgot" will be remembered by his hometown of Buffalo, New York, when the Lt. Col. Matt Urban Monument Fund presents a day of activities to honor and remember his bravery, valor and service; and I ask that this Congress, while pausing in memory of all those who have fallen in defense of freedom and liberty, join me in a special salute to our nation's most decorated combat veteran, Lt. Col. Matt Urban.

CONFLICT IN THE MIDDLE EAST

HON. SUSAN DAVIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mrs. DAVIS of California. Mr. Speaker, as we all reflect on the grave situation in the Middle East, I commend to all my colleagues the following OpEd piece published in the May 18, 2001 San Diego Union Tribune.

NEGOTIATIONS CAN STOP BLOODSHED

(By Yuval Rotem)

Since the days of Sir Isaac Newton school-children have been taught that for every action there is a reaction, and that there is an axiomatic distinction between cause and effect. This truth applies both to the world of physics and to today's conflict in the Middle East.

For over eight months, the citizens of Israel have been confronted with a virulent campaign of violence and terror. Israel, like any other nation, has a right and obligation to react in order to protect the lives of its citizens. The legitimacy of self-defense is a foundation of international law and of the United Nations Charter.

That both Israelis and Palestinians have suffered due to the current uprising, there can be no doubt. Yet while it may be easy to assign equal blame to the two sides, there is in truth no equivalence between the actions of Palestinian terrorists and the reaction of the Israelis whom they target.

If Chairman Yasser Arafat and other Palestinian leaders were to call for a cessation of shootings and bombings, an end to the violence would be well within reach. No such calls have been issued, and the Palestinians continue to shoot, and Israel is compelled to react. That anyone is killed is unjustifiable, but sometimes it is forgotten who exactly started the shooting, and who continues to deem indiscriminate killing as a legitimate bargaining chip.

Israel cannot sit idly on the sidelines while its people pay the ultimate price for the Palestinian leadership's opting for confrontation over reconciliation. Palestinian leaders and militias consider violence to be an effective tool in promoting a unilateral solution to a conflict which Israel believes can only be addressed via bilateral negotiation.

Palestinian gunmen purposely select targets with the intention of maximizing carnage and shock value. Suicide bombers and explosive devices containing nails and shrapnel are employed in densely populated civilian areas. Israeli children and adults are maimed and murdered while shopping at the mall or riding on the bus.

Israel, forced to defend itself, undertakes operations designed to hamper further terror, striking only against those actively involved in violence. For the most part, Israeli reprisals against those initiating terror strikes are extremely accurate. However, sometimes unintended consequences have regrettably occurred.

There have even been instances when children have been injured. In the vast majority of cases, this takes place when Palestinian children are intentionally used as human shields serving as buffers for gunmen firing upon Israeli targets. Remember that the Israeli army is no longer deployed in Palestinian populated areas. In order for stone-throwing children to be within close proximity to Israeli forces, they have to be consciously transported to such locations by their elders.

Despite this brutal tactic, Israeli forces do their utmost to prevent casualties. Tragically, a totally innocent child, five-month-old Iman Haju, fell victim last week. She was unintentionally killed in Israeli return fire, which was directed at positions used by a Palestinian mortar crew to bombard an Israeli community just minutes earlier.

The fact is that terrorists have been consistently launching mortars from civilian sites such as school yards and apartment buildings. By contrast, Palestinian militants have routinely and specifically targeted Israeli children. Shalhevet Pass, a 10-month-old Israeli girl, was spotted, fixed and then shot in the head by a Palestinian sniper in March. In the past week, two 13-year-old Israeli boys were brutally stoned to death, and their bodies mutilated by terrorists while hiking in a riverbed close to their homes.

These are not cases of unintentional civilian casualties. These and other Israeli children were slain because their Palestinian executioners found them to be useful targets. Such heinous actions do not arise in a vacuum.

Since the Palestinian rejection of the proposals offered by former Prime Minister Barak and President Clinton, the Palestinian Authority has carefully orchestrated a campaign of hatred and incitement through its official newspapers, television and radio stations, its schools and religious institutions.

Palestinian Authority spokesmen have praised violence and suicide bombings. The Palestinian Authority has freed known terrorists from prison, and official Palestinian police and security forces have joined in attacks upon Israeli civilians with impunity. Palestinians have employed illegal mortars and anti-tank weapons against Israeli communities, and heavy arms such as Katyusha artillery rockets and shoulder-fired anti-aircraft missiles are now being smuggled into Palestinian territory.

The Palestinian leadership is doing nothing to prevent further escalation of violence, and the people of Israel are wondering just exactly what the Palestinians are trying to achieve.

An end to the occupation? Some 98 percent of Palestinians already live under Palestinian control. Statehood and independence? It was offered and rejected. An end to check points? More territory? It was offered and rejected. Not only were all attempts to genuinely settle the conflict rejected out of hand, but the Palestinians responded to them—instead of with counter-proposals for peace—with intifada, jihad and terror.

The current confrontation is one which Israel neither sought nor initiated, and still, there is no desire for punishment and revenge. There is no wish to suppress or repress anyone. What point does it serve?

Negotiation and education for peace are the only means forward, and hopefully a meaningful resumption of dialogue can begin again soon. In the meantime, the Palestinian leadership must be made to understand that terrorism and bloodshed cannot exist side by side with diplomacy.

The path of violence was supposed to have been forever abandoned on Sept. 13, 1993, when Chairman Arafat shook the hand of Israel's late Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, and pledged in word and in writing to forswear achieving his goals by the sword. Though that day over seven years ago seems so remote, it must continue to guide all sides even now.

Terror will not bring the Palestinian people what they desire. They will not be able to gain through violence what they could not gain through negotiation. Only a return to talks and moderation can bring a mutually acceptable settlement for both sides.

Rotem is consul general of Israel to the southwestern United States.

INTRODUCTION OF THE ACT TO LEAVE NO CHILD BEHIND

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. GEORGE MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to submit to my colleagues in the House the Act to Leave No Child Behind. Today I am joined by the gentlewoman from Connecticut, Ms. DELAURO, and the gentleman from California, Mr. STARK, in announcing its introduction.

An Act to Leave No Child Behind has ambitious but achievable goals: to eliminate child poverty, end child hunger, prepare children to enter school ready to learn, and provide children with health insurance and other vital services necessary for the successful development of America's children. Our bill is a road map for the safe and healthy development of America's children.

America must make a choice when it comes to the future of our neediest children. We must choose whether we will invest in the healthy development of our children or in the richest one percent of taxpayers in this country. We cannot do both. This bill represents a vision and a commitment toward a future where all children have a chance to succeed.

An Act to Leave No Child Behind, combines several pieces of legislation that could be acted upon separately at the appropriate time. Taken together, however, this bill moves us forward on the path where all children have quality health care, educational opportunity, quality child care and safe communities. This legislation provides every child and their parents with health insurance, lifts every child from poverty through tax credits, work supports, and a new minimum wage, and ends child hunger through the expansion of food programs. This bill makes sure every child is ready for school by fully funding quality early learning programs, and offers significant reforms for our system of public education that increases accountability, reduces classroom size, and guarantees that all children will be taught by qualified teachers in modern and safe classrooms. This legislation also addresses the issue of affordable housing and safe communities through sensible environmental protections, gun safety laws, and programs to reduce children's exposure to neglect, abuse, and violence.

I am so proud to have working with me on this legislation, my friend Senator CHRISTOPHER DODD (D-CT) and the Children's Defense Fund. Despite President Bush's use of the term, it was in fact the Children's Defense Fund that trademarked the phrase "Leave No Child Behind" in 1994. And it has been justified in using it ever since as it has waged a relentless battle to knock America's political establishment to its senses on behalf of our neediest children. This bill is the real deal—it is the real Act to Leave No Child Behind. It addresses the most important issue facing our country—the children who have been and continue to be left behind. We understand that our bill is asking for a significant commitment in federal resources to help children. But we think that is the right direction for us to take. We also strongly believe that we have the resources for this effort. And, perhaps most important, we understand that the continued neglect of the real needs of children has come at a great price and will continue to cost our society—and these children—dearly.

Mr. Speaker, I urge Members of the House to join me and co-sponsor the Act to Leave No Child Behind.

HONORING FORMER CONGRESSMAN PAUL G. ROGERS

HON. E. CLAY SHAW, JR.

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize former Congressman Paul G. Rogers who will be honored on June 12th by the dedication of the Paul G. Rogers Plaza at the National Institutes of Health. This occasion is a tribute to Paul's accomplishments in the fields of health and the environment.

Paul G. Rogers was elected to Congress in 1954 where he represented South Floridians living in Palm Beach and Broward Counties for twenty-four years. Paul was a well-respected Member of Congress who was known as a man of integrity. He is recognized and has been widely honored for his sponsorship of numerous pieces of legislation in the areas of health and the environment including the National Cancer Acts of 1971 and 1977 and the Clean Air and Water Act. This legislation has saved the lives of countless Americans and improved the quality of life for all Americans.

As Chairman of the House Committee on Health and the Environment, Paul used his broad knowledge and deep understanding of health and environmental issues to build a consensus of opinion in favor of Congressional action in these areas. In fact, he is often referred to as "Mr. Health." Paul was always more interested in results than in partisan politics and therefore was able to move widely supported bipartisan legislation. His accomplishments are a legacy that demonstrates what can be done in Congress if we work together for the public good. Today I have the privilege of representing parts of Paul's district and am trying to follow the trail that he blazed in these important areas.

The Paul G. Rogers Plaza at the National Institutes of Health honors this outstanding American, and my friend, Paul Rogers. I hope that the work done at this Plaza will be worthy of the name it has been given.

SOJOURNER TRUTH

HON. TOM SAWYER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, on May 29, we will celebrate the legacy of the famed abolitionist and feminist, Sojourner Truth. She was born Isabella Baumfree, as a slave. She escaped slavery and adopted the name Sojourner Truth when she began preaching across the nation.

It was in Akron, Ohio, at the Second Annual Women of Ohio Convention on May 29, 1851, that she delivered her powerful "Ain't I a Woman?" speech. It is appropriate to honor her work and her legacy on the 150th anniversary of that remarkable speech. It is especially appropriate to do so in the city where she delivered it.

A friend of mine, the late Faye H. Dambrot, a leading advocate of rights for women, equality, and justice, wrote a testimonial to Sojourner Truth and her famous speech, which I am honored to submit for the RECORD.

Born the slave Isabella Baumfree in 1797 in Ulster County, New York, this articulate woman with her commanding voice and imposing stature began her career by preaching and lecturing against slavery after the New York emancipation laws of 1827 were passed. Deeply religious and mystical, she chose the name Sojourner Truth to reflect her commitment to travel widely and spread the truth to her audiences. During her extensive journeys through the North and Midwest, she spoke of having been beaten, raped, and forcibly separated from her children and other loved ones under slavery.

In addition to her ministry and ardent abolitionism, Sojourner soon embraced the cause of women's rights, knowing well the double yoke of racism and sexism which bound black women. She worked to raise money for the North during the Civil War, helped emancipated blacks find jobs and housing in Washington, D.C., and even struggled against segregation by her insistence on riding public street cars.

She supported herself through the sale of her autobiography, My Narrative, and counted Abraham Lincoln, Lucretia Mott, Susan B. Anthony and Frederick Douglass among her friends. Sojourner Truth continued her life of struggle and agitation until ill health forced her retirement. She died near Battle Creek, Michigan on November 26, 1883.

Sojourner was not a welcome speaker at Akron's Women of Ohio Convention, many women present feared the cause of abolitionism would be detrimentally linked to the suffrage struggle and urged the chairwoman, Frances Gage, to prevent her addressing the crowd. The assembled local clergymen were swaying those present with their declarations about the natural superiority of man, Eve's "original sin," the manhood of Christ, and the deference and privilege owed to women which was being jeopardized by demands for equal rights. But Sojourner was not dissuaded as she solemnly strode forward, laid her old bonnet at her feet, and within moments had, with her eloquence, turned the adverse tide of the meeting to a victory for women's rights.

She intoned, "Well children, where there is so much racket there must be something out of kilter . . . But what's all this here talking about?"

"That man over there say that women needs to be helped into carriages, and lifted over ditches, and to have the best place everywhere. Nobody ever helps me into carriages, or over mud-puddles, or gives me any best place!"

She drew herself up to her full height, and with a voice like rolling thunder continued. "And ain't I a women? Look at me! Look at my arm! . . . I have ploughed, and planted and gathered into barns, and no man could head me! And ain't I a woman? I could work as much and eat as much as a man—when I could get it—and bear the lash as well! And ain't I a woman? I have borne 13 children, and seen them most all sold off to slavery, and when I cried out with my mother's grief, none but Jesus hear me! And ain't I a woman . . . ?"

"That little man in black there, he say women can't have as much rights as men, because Christ wasn't a woman! Where did your Christ come from? From God and a woman! Man had nothing to do with Him.

"If the first woman God ever made was strong enough to turn the world upside down all alone, these women together ought to be able to turn it back, and get it right side up again! . . ."

Frances Gage tells her recollection of the crowd's reaction. She says, "Amid roars of applause, she returned to her corner, leaving more than one of us with streaming eyes, and hearts beating with gratitude. She had taken us up in her strong arms and carried us safely over the slough of difficulty, turning the whole tide in our favor. I have never in my life seen anything like the magical influence that subdued the mobbish spirit of the day, and turned the sneers and jeers of an excited crowd into notes of respect and admiration. Hundreds rushed up to shake hands with her, and bid her Godspeed on her mission of testifying again concerning the wickedness of this here people."

Mr. Speaker, in standing up for her beliefs, Sojourner Truth became a role model for all Americans, not just women or people of color. Sojourner Truth was the living embodiment of the basic American tenet that each and every individual has intrinsic worth.

As historian David McCullough reminds us, history didn't have to happen the way it did. History is created by the actions of far-sighted men and women like Sojourner Truth.

ASIAN PACIFIC AMERICAN HERITAGE MONTH

HON. HILDA L. SOLIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Ms. SOLIS. Mr. Speaker, May is the month our nation honors Asian Pacific American Heritage. As the Representative of a very ethnically diverse community, I would like to take this opportunity to recognize those in my Congressional district who come from Asian descent.

About 11 million Americans come from Asian or Pacific Island descent. Many Asian immigrants came to this country as laborers in the agriculture and transportation industries. First enduring harsh working conditions in the earlier part of the nineteenth century, many Asian Pacific Americans have now become successful entrepreneurs, teachers, entertainers, and technological professionals. In fact, our U.S. Congress has been home to 32 elected Members of Asian ancestry since 1903.

I would like to acknowledge the achievements of a specific young woman in my district who has made a great contribution to the United States Air Force, the City of Baldwin Park, and the Filipino community. Lieutenant Venus C. Rivera is the first person from Baldwin Park with Filipino American parents to graduate from the United States Air Force Academy. This Dean's List honor student will be trained as a jet pilot upon her graduation this month. I know she will continue to serve as an inspiration to all young Asian Americans in the United States.

Asian Pacific Americans bring a richness to our culture, adding diversity in language, cuisine, religion, and art. I am proud that our country takes this month to honor the heritage of this particular group. However, the diversity of all races and cultures must be something that we remember and respect every day. This will help promote racial tolerance so future generations can build a world that benefits from the ethnic contributions of all cultures.

TRIBUTE TO WORLD WAR II VETERAN MIKE LUCERO

HON. SCOTT McINNIS

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. McINNIS. Mr. Speaker, I am extremely proud to rise today to honor a very special man—World War II Veteran Mike Lucero, a resident of Montrose, Colorado. During his time with the Armed Forces, Mike was stationed in the South Pacific. And what he didn't know is that he and his fellow soldiers were about to change the course of history. Because of what Mike did during World War II, I would like to thank him for his bravery and courage on behalf of Congress.

On December 1, 1942, at the age of 19, Mike left the small town of Cuba, New Mexico for the open water of the South Pacific. "My country needed me. I had to go," said Mike. At dawn on June 15, 1944, Coxswain Third Class Lucero maneuvered his landing craft along side the USS Livingston, where members of the 2nd Marine Division boarded his LCVP.

They were headed toward Saipan, which is the northernmost of the southern four islands in the Marianas 3,200 miles northwest of Pearl Harbor and 1,500 miles from Manila. Over 29,000 Japanese troops waited and guarded the narrow beaches of Saipan. Mike's job was to land Marines on the shore. "The bullets zipping into the water looked like raindrops hitting a puddle. They were striking on both sides of my boat," said the 79-year-old as he recalled the battle. "They gave us the order to land over a loud speaker and we headed for shore. There were bodies floating in the water."

Mike delivered 8,000 Marines on Saipan's beach in less than an hour. It was the beginning of one of the bloodiest fights in the Pacific. On the shore looking at all the Americans coming toward him was the man who pulled the trigger on the surprise attack on Pearl Harbor, Vice Admiral Chuichi Nagumo. After the battle, almost 29,000 Japanese had been killed. The Marines, the 27th Army Infantry and the Navy were victorious. Mr. Speaker, it is with great appreciation that I ask Congress to recognize and honor Mike Lucero for all that he did for this country in World War II. Mike was just a boy when he was thrust into battle, but his bravery and the bravery of those who fought and died for this country will forever be etched in our minds. Mr. Speaker, I proudly salute Mike for all he has done.

HONORING RICHARD A. LUOMA

HON. JOSEPH M. HOEFFEL

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. HOEFFEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to congratulate Richard A. Luoma upon his retirement from the Hatboro-Horsham School District in Montgomery County, Pennsylvania after 29 years of dedicated service.

Dick graduated from Fitchburg State College where he received a Bachelor of Science degree and went on to an advanced degree from Boston University. He first taught math and science at Groton Middle School in Concord, Massachusetts and later he was promoted to Assistant Principal. Following his move to Montgomery County in 1972, Dick became the principal at Keith Valley Middle School and Loller Middle School. He was promoted to the position of Assistant to the Superintendent in charge of Curriculum and Instruction and finally Assistant Superintendent in Hatboro-Horsham.

He has been a dedicated citizen of his community as well. Dick has been a member of the Horsham Rotary for 28 years and has also served as president and secretary of that organization. He has been active in politics for the Republican Party in Towamencin Township. An avid golfer, Dick was president of the Men's Golf Association at Oak Terrace Country Club and continues to serve on the Board of Directors at the Talamore Golf and Country Club.

I am honored to recognize Richard A. Luoma and his long and productive career dedicated to our children. He has never wavered in his belief that our youth are our future.

THE FEDERALIZATION OF CRIMES UNIFORM STANDARDS (FOCUS) ACT

HON. DONALD A. MANZULLO

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. MANZULLO. Mr. Speaker, almost one year ago, to the day, I introduced the Federalization of Crimes Uniform Standards (FOCUS) Act. I rise today, to re-introduce that legislation.

The bill lays out what the appropriate Federal activity—response—is to an offense against the Federal Government. Under the bill, Section 6, an offense, or federal crime, is an activity with respect to which a clear need for uniform Federal law enforcement exists. This includes an activity that involves conduct of an interstate or international nature, or of such magnitude or complexity that a State acting alone cannot carry out effective law enforcement with respect to that conduct; or, that involves conduct of overriding national interest, such as interference with the exercise of constitutional rights. The criminal conduct must be an offense directly against the Federal Government, including an offense directly against an officer, employee, agency or instrumentality of the Federal Government.

The idea behind this is to set a standard definition to what constitutes a federal crime. The current method seems to be that a federal crime is whatever Congress deems it to be, without any true consideration of the constitutional issues involved. Therefore, under the current methods, political will is the only thing that keeps us from federalizing crime. Political weakness in the face of media sound bite criticisms, forces Congress to act again and again to federalize crime—even when there is nothing but rhetoric to suggest that "something must be done!" to fight crime.

Sometimes less is better. It's high time that Congress takes a serious look at the federalization of crimes in the United States. The State and Federal Courts together comprise an intertwined system for the administration of justice in the United States. The two courts systems have played different but equally significant roles in the Federal system. However, the State courts have served as the primary tribunals for trials of criminal law cases.

The Federal Courts have a more limited jurisdiction than the State Courts with respect to criminal matters because of the fundamental constitutional principle that the Federal government is a government of delegated power in which the residual power remains with the States. In criminal matters, the jurisdiction of the Federal Courts should complement, not supplant, that of the State Courts.

The 1999 Year-End Report on the Federal Judiciary shows how its caseload has grown:

One hundred years ago, there were 108 authorized federal judgeships in the federal judiciary, consisting of 71 district judgeships, 28 appellate judgeships, and 9 Supreme Court Justices. Today, there are over 850—including 655 district judgeships, 179 appellate judgeships and 9 Supreme Court Justices. In 1900, 13,605 cases were filed in federal district courts, and 1,093 in courts of appeals. In 1999, over 320,194 cases were filed in federal district courts, over 54,600 in courts of appeals, and over 1,300,000 filings were made in bankruptcy courts alone.

It is apparent that some growth of the federal court system should occur over time due to increases in population. But what also has grown substantially is the scope of federal jurisdiction. Federalization of the states criminal codes is something that politicians, especially here at the federal level, cannot seem to help but engage in from time to time. It has been over time, in response to criminal concerns nationwide, that Congress has again and again federalized crimes in the name of fighting crime and protecting the nation's populace. But, is the federalization of crime really an antidote for our nation's crime problems? Is it really proper to federalize crime so politicians can "prove" their effectiveness? These are important questions that must be asked. We all must look in the mirror and ask ourselves whether there is a sound justification for having two parallel justice systems.

Americans should not be subject to different, competing law enforcement systems, different penalties depending on which system brings them to trial, and an ever-lengthening possibility that they might be tried for the same offense more than once.

In 1999, the Senate Government Affairs Committee held hearings on the issue of "controlling the federalization of crimes that are better left to state laws and courts to handle." The hearings were held in part as a response to questions raised by Supreme Court Chief Justice William Rehnquist regarding the federalization of criminal law. The hearings also focused on the American Bar Association's Task Force on the same issue. The Task Force, which was chaired by former Attorney General Edwin Meese, concluded that in order to maintain balance in our Constitutional system of justice, there must be a "principled recognition by Congress for the long-range damage to real crime control and to the nation's structure caused by inappropriate federalization."

Some might suggest that this is a Republican's attempt to weaken the laws of the land. My reply is simply that federalization of crime does not make anyone safer. Simply adding more laws to the federal code will not necessarily help the citizenry. On the contrary, it could end up hurting those we want to help.

Consider that increased federalization has caused a significant case backlog in our federal courts. Those people with cases pending in the federal system for things other than criminal purposes are impacted. Their rights to due process for fair hearings on their issues are delayed. The rights of those who are criminal victims are often delayed, too, due to the length of time it takes at the federal level to hear a criminal case. The backlogs are real. The delays are frustrating. Justice is not being served.

Some might say, simply, let's add more money so we can get these cases to trial. Again, my response to that is: why should we have two entirely parallel systems of justice in our country? Money is not the answer. Better utilization of our constitutional system of federalism and separation of powers is a good place to begin.

Let the states work their will. The Federal Government doesn't always have the best answers. We effectively have 50 different constitutional republics that can and do serve as policy laboratories. The electorate in these states are the very same people that elect us all to Congress. They can take control of what is happening in their states and compare outcomes with 49 other state jurisdictions (not to mention the District of Columbia and the territories). With a federal system, will we ultimately move to a single federal criminal code? It would appear that way. It may not happen this year, this decade or even this century. However, over the course of time, the trend indeed is moving that way.

This bill is a common sense approach to checking the Congress' penchant for federalizing crimes. It sets guidelines for Congress, which will certainly debate crime again in the legislative branch. The standards state that no federal criminal legislation shall be enacted unless and until certain criteria are met: the legislation must center on the core functions discussed earlier; the States must be inadequately addressing the perceived need; the Federal Judiciary is able to meet the needs without restructuring and without affecting efficiency; and, the bill includes a federal law enforcement impact statement. We pass bills all the time to address certain needs. Let's put the rhetoric to a test.

The bill also sets up a Commission to Review the Federal Criminal Code. This commission will review, ascertain, evaluate, report, and recommend action to the Congress on the following matters: the Federal criminal code (Title 18) and any other federal crimes as to compliance with the standards in this Act; recommend changes, either through amendment or repeal, to the President and Congress where appropriate to the offenses set forth in said criminal code (Title 18) or otherwise; and such other related matters as the Commission deems appropriate.

Also, for each piece of legislation passed out of congressional committees of jurisdiction that modify or add to federal criminal code, the commission must submit a report to Congress. This report will be called a Federal Crimes Impact Statement that shall be included in the reports filed prior to consideration by the House and Senate.

The membership of the commission is important to consider. The bill calls for 5 appointed members—1 each from both sides of the aisle in the House and Senate, and one appointed by the Chief Justice of the United States, who shall chair the Commission. This will bring a new, and much needed, dimension to the debate. Under the bill, the commission would be charged with obtaining official data directly from any department or agency of the United States necessary for it to carry out this section—unless doing so would threaten the national security, the health or safety of any individual, or the integrity of an ongoing investigation.

Finally, the bill would subject certain legislation to a point of order—if it has not met the conditions set out in the legislation. This would provide additional time for Congress to debate the merits of legislation being considered.

In effect, this bill is about considerate and appropriate debate for federalizing crime. It will help educate Congress to make more informed decisions that impact the daily lives of all of our constituents. It will help take some of the politics out of the important issues that we face with regard to protecting people from crime.

Mr. Speaker, we need to act. The Judiciary has made subtle and not so subtle pleas for Congress to refrain from and restrain its penchant to federalize the criminal code. For example, last year in a decision concerning the Violence Against Women Act, the Chief Justice writes,

[t]he Constitution requires a distinction between what is truly national and what is truly local, and there is no better example of the police power, which the Founders undeniably left reposed in the States and denied the central government, than the suppression of violent crime and vindication of its victims. Congress therefore may not regulate noneconomic, violent criminal conduct based solely on the conducts' aggregate effect on interstate commerce. [U.S. v. Morrison et al. decided May 15, 2000 (Syllabus)]

Clearly, there is a message in those words about the federalization of crime. It is time that Congress heeds it.

I look forward to working with my colleagues to move this important legislation.

TRIBUTE TO PFC BAMBI D. CHASTAIN

HON. SCOTT McINNIS

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. McINNIS. Mr. Speaker, I stand before you today to ask Congress to join me in honoring the memory of one of our young soldiers. On May 15, 2001, PFC Bambi D. Chastain passed away at the age of 21. Bambi was an exemplary soldier and a wonderful daughter, sister and friend. She worked hard at her job and took great pride in being a soldier. Although her family and friends will miss her, her memory will live on in those who loved her. Bambi died while on duty in the field training. To her, duty came first.

Bambi was born August 22, 1980 in San Diego, California. She attended Central High School, where she graduated in 1999. In August of that same year she joined the United States Army. She attended the Advanced Individual Training at Fort Sam Houston, Texas. After she finished AIT, Bambi was assigned to Charlie Company, 15th Forward Support Battalion, First Cavalry Division, Fort Hood, Texas. In March of 2000 she began training for a rotation at the National Training Center as part of the Quick Reaction Force. During her time with AIT she was awarded the MOS 91B10 Combat Medic and was posthumously awarded the Good Conduct Medal and the Army Commendation Medal.

Bambi moved to Grand Junction to live with Dave and Verna Murphy, which would become her new family. Recently she visited a group of foster kids in California, to offer hope and to let them know if you join the Army you get a whole new family to love and care for you.

Mr. Speaker, PFC Bambi Chastain displayed great professionalism and selfless service while serving her country. She put herself second chair to her duty. She is a role model for everyone that knew her. For that Mr. Speaker, she deserves and has earned the thanks and praise of Congress.

A TRIBUTE TO JOHN THOMAS THORNTON, JR.

HON. SANFORD D. BISHOP, JR.

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. BISHOP. Mr. Speaker, last July I had an opportunity to participate in a day of celebration and remembrance of the great contribution to agriculture and the economy in general made by the late John Thomas Thornton, Jr., of the community of Parrott, Georgia. If you are not familiar with the name, you are not alone. Even in the area of southwest Georgia where he lived and farmed most of his life, many people are not fully aware of his contribution, which impacts our lives even today.

J.T. Thornton invented the peanut shaker, a harvesting device that came into common use in the 1940's. His invention revolutionized the peanut industry. By making the harvesting process faster and more efficient, the peanut shaker contributed greatly to the economic growth of our area of Georgia and, in fact, to the country at large.

Mr. Thornton spent some 40 years developing and perfecting his invention. It was a magnificent achievement. The history of this achievement was beautifully presented in an essay written by a student from Parrott, Bonnie West, who won high honors when she entered the paper in the National History Day competition. Her accomplishment helped revive community interest in Mr. Thornton's invention, which he called the "Victory Peanut Harvester."

The people of Parrott, including members of the Thornton family, are establishing a museum on the invention of the peanut shaker, and sponsored the day of celebration that included a parade and a number of other events. It was an exciting and enjoyable day, and it helped bring wider recognition of what this native southwest Georgian achieved.

Although farmers did not have any more spare time back then than they do today, J.T.

Thornton somehow found the time to apply his practical knowledge of farming, and his extraordinary grasp of engineering and mechanics, to overcome all of the difficulties he must have encountered until he produced something that raised the quality of life for countless Americans. This is a story we are proud of in southwest Georgia, and that can inspire other Americans, especially our young people. Mr. Speaker, it is, therefore, a story I want to share with our colleagues in Congress.

IN MEMORY OF DENIS NICKEL

HON. MIKE THOMPSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. THOMPSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the achievements of Denis Gene Nickel, a man who led a life that we can all admire and emulate. Denis devoted his life to improving the world we live in, and he realized incredible success in his efforts to save our nation's natural resources for future generations. He has left us with a legacy that demonstrates the power of partnerships and stewardship of our natural resources.

Denis gave thirty-four years of dedicated service to the Natural Resource Conservation Service. As an Area Conservationist in Santa Rosa, Denis worked extensively in the North Coast counties that I represent. His leadership in forming a coalition of local, private, state and federal agencies to manage the Mendocino County Tomki Watershed was invaluable in garnering support for such an incredibly important project in the 1st District of California.

In addition, Denis provided tremendous assistance and guidance to those involved in the viticulture industry in Napa and Sonoma counties. He was a pioneer in promoting local stewardship in the development of hillside erosion control methods—these methods are the bedrock of the methods currently used by viticulturists around the nation. The personal integrity that Denis showed in his daily work facilitated building a durable consensus of stakeholders in our nation's natural resources.

Denis was the consummate family man who enjoyed spending his time with a large extended family. He was married to his high school sweetheart, Sandi, for thirty-five years, and he was immensely proud of his three children, Wendy, Warren, and Amy.

His smile and good-natured sense of humor that his family and friends knew so well helped him to establish trusted relationships while working towards the admirable goal of sustaining America's vital resources. Denis worked not only for the benefit of the people of my district, but he has also been recognized across the country for his tremendous contributions, including his term as State Conservationist for the Natural Resources Conservation Service in Rhode Island.

Mr. Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to honor the many invaluable contributions Denis Nickel made to my district and the entire nation. We would be fortunate to have more people of Denis's integrity working towards sustaining our natural resources for future generations.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

LEGISLATION TO IMPROVE TRADE RELATIONS IN THE AUTOMOTIVE SECTOR BETWEEN KOREA AND THE U.S.

HON. DALE E. KILDEE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, as co-chair of the House Auto Caucus with Congressman FRED UPTON, I am introducing on our behalf a concurrent resolution to express this Congress' support for improved trade relations in the automotive sector between Korea and the United States. A companion concurrent resolution is being introduced by the Senate Auto Caucus co-chairs, Senator CARL LEVIN and Senator GEORGE VOINOVICH.

For too long, Korea has kept its market closed to United States automobiles and auto parts. This must change.

Up until 1990, Korea maintained a completely closed market, and it was not until 1999, in the midst of economic crisis, that it opened its market to all manufacturers. However, it has made every effort to continue to restrict foreign motor vehicles. This is best exemplified by the facts. In the year 2000, a total of 1,057,620 motor vehicles were sold in the Republic of Korea, but only 4414 were imported and only 1268 were made in the United States. As a result, American motor vehicles represented a pathetic 0.12 percent of all motor vehicle sales in Korea.

Anticompetitive activities in Korea must stop. Threats of income tax audits on Koreans who purchase foreign automobiles must cease. Underhanded trade barriers must be lowered. Passage of this concurrent resolution will send a clear message to Korea that things must change.

I encourage all of my colleagues to support this effort to ensure fair trade and an open market for American motor vehicles in Korea. I look forward to working with colleagues to ensure its passage.

A TRIBUTE TO MR. JEFFERSON STEPHENS, JR.

HON. ADAM B. SCHIFF

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. SCHIFF. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor Mr. Jefferson Stephens, Jr., who is retiring after more than twenty years as Headmaster of the Chandler School in Pasadena, California. On June 16th, the school will celebrate Mr. Stephens' career and the impact he has had on the lives of so many.

The Chandler School was founded with a vision to provide young students with innovative, inspired academic programs taught by caring, dedicated faculty and staff. Under Mr. Stephens' guidance, the Chandler School treats each child as an individual and strives to create an environment in which children develop self-esteem and self-discipline, as well as respect for their fellow students. As headmaster, Mr. Stephens, has expected high standards of behavior, courtesy, and academic performance from each child who has come to his school, and has fostered a scholastic atmosphere that encourages curiosity and creativity.

In addition to serving the academic community, Mr. Stephens has served as an associate pastor for the St. George's Episcopal Church. He has also participated in a wide range of civic duties, by assisting as a member of the Tournament of Roses Association and serving on the board of directors for a community housing project.

Our community gives heartfelt thanks to Mr. Stephens for his lifelong commitment to education and his ongoing dedication to public service. He is an asset to our community, and I want to thank Mr. Stephens for his years of hard work and selfless dedication and congratulate him on a well-deserved retirement.

THE WATER ENHANCEMENT SECURITY ACT

HON. GARY A. CONDIT

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. CONDIT. Mr. Speaker, I join with Mr. CALVERT today in introducing the "Water Enhancement Security Act". This bill is the culmination of almost one decade of work by the Congress and the state Legislature, federal and state agencies and the California business community, agricultural and urban water districts and environmental groups.

For years, the water system in California seems to have been "broken"—our main water system, the Sacramento-San Joaquin River Delta and San Francisco Bay has been in a state of crisis due to conflicts between environmental protection, water use and water quality. In a state where we seem to either feast on water or famine without water, the drought of 1987–92 demonstrated just how vulnerable California is to water shortages, and the flood of 1997 demonstrated how vulnerable we are to the effects of flooding. Frequent conflicts between water quality, fish protection and water supply magnify the problem and demonstrate just how little "give" there is in our current system. With the state's population expected to grow from 34 million today to 59 million in 2040, the need to conserve, to better manage our existing supplies and to attain greater storage capacity is critical.

Despite the years of recognition by most Californians as to the need to attain these goals, no major achievement in our water policy had taken place since the 1960s, when, under Governor Pat Brown's leadership, the State Water Project was conceived. That was, however, until CalFed was formed in 1994.

In response to the water conflicts and the feast or famine predicament that we were under, the state and federal Administrations began talks, known as "CalFed". Over a period of years, 18 state and federal agencies have conducted hundreds of meetings, public hearings and negotiations with stakeholders regarding ways to better manage the Sacramento-San Joaquin River Delta for those who depend upon it, as well as ways to restore the Bay-Delta's ecosystem. It seemed that there was everything to loose and everything to be gained.—as the hub of California's water supply, the Sacramento-San Joaquin River Delta is an important natural ecosystem that is the source of water for over 22 million Californians and for irrigation for the Central Valley, which produces 45 percent of US fruits and vegetables.

Last year, I worked closely with California Governor Gray Davis and then Secretary of the Interior, Bruce Babbitt on a package that would move the CalFed program forward. Then, in June, 2000, Governor Davis and Secretary of Interior Babbitt announced a historic blueprint—the CalFed Framework for Action, followed by the Record of Decision in July, 2000. The legislation being introduced today is the crucial next step for the program. It authorizes the CalFed program to move forward, and expands this blueprint to other regions of the state.

Balance is the cornerstone of this bill. This bill ensures a long-lasting balanced program with the visionary and innovative approach of linking progress on water supply and water quality with progress to the environment, and with linking environmental progress to improvements in water supply and water quality. This theme of balance is echoed throughout the bill—there is balance in the structure for governance, balance in ecosystem/non-ecosystem programming, balance among the various regions of the state and balance in funding.

The bill is comprehensive and action-oriented. This bill provides real, tangible improvements for the environment, water quality and water supply throughout California. It commits to desperately needed additional surface and groundwater storage by authorizing water supply, water quality and flood control infrastructure improvements for a system that hasn't seen any major improvements in over 30 years. It contains short-term water supply improvements for water users that rely upon Delta exports and that have been disproportionately impacted by federal regulatory requirements. It expands environmental restoration projects in wetlands, the Sacramento-San Joaquin River Bay Delta estuary, and rivers and streams. It expands and funds state-of-the-art water recycling and conservation programs throughout California. Each of these program elements is essential to improving the reliability and quality of California's water supply.

We are at a crossroad in California, as well as in most other regions of the country. For decades, we have benefited from the foresight of our predecessors—in their vision of what infrastructure would be necessary to meet our energy needs, our water needs, our transportation needs, our educational needs. I believe that it's time for us to exercise that same leadership, that same vision. I believe that it is time to prepare our generation and the generations that will follow us for the future. In meeting these needs, I believe that we can benefit from the things that we have learned over the last several decades about how to better protect the environment and about how to better conserve, while at the same time, providing for greater economic progress. This bill charts a course for attaining that vision.

I want to thank Mr. CALVERT for his leadership and efforts. I know that he and his staff have worked tirelessly to craft a fair and balanced program. I am committed, and I know that Mr. CALVERT is committed as well, to continue to work with Senator FEINSTEIN on her bill, and with the state and federal agencies and Administrations, and with all stakeholders on refinements to the bill to ensure that its potential benefits are met.

INTERVIEW WITH UKRAINIAN PRESIDENT LEONID KUCHMA

HON. ELIOT L. ENGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to call to the attention of my colleagues a recent interview with Ukrainian President Leonid Kuchma which appeared in The International Jerusalem Post on May 11, 2001. This important interview discusses a wide range of matters from Ukraine's cooperation with NATO to its relations with Israel to its current state of economic development. The interview also provides President Kuchma an opportunity to respond to some of the criticism recently leveled against him.

I ask that the article be printed at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

[From the International Jerusalem Post,
May 11, 2001]

THE VIEW FROM KIEV

UKRAINIAN PRESIDENT LEONID KUCHMA TALKS ABOUT HIS COUNTRY'S RELATIONSHIP WITH ISRAEL, THE SOMETIMES TROUBLED PAST OF ITS JEWISH COMMUNITY, AND ITS POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC FUTURE

(By Thomas A. Rose)

Mr. President, thank you for agreeing to share your thoughts with our readers. Your administration has come under increasing criticism from opponents who accuse your government of everything from failing to implement meaningful economic reform to suppressing press freedoms and even to charges that you were personally involved in the death of a prominent journalist. As a result, many in the West, particularly the United States, have started to question your country's political stability. How would you respond to these charges and concerns?

Politically, Ukraine is both stable and predictable. Industrial production is up, financial markets are improved, our agricultural sector is showing great promise, and we are beginning to see real progress in our effort to redress social contradictions.

Governmental bodies and the local authorities are functioning normally.

The world must know of the tremendous progress we have made and of the tremendous progress we will make. Our state is only 10 years old. In that short time, we have developed a functioning democracy, a free press, an independent financial system, and have become the first nation in history to voluntarily renounce and destroy its nuclear weapons' capability. These are not small accomplishments.

Regarding the attacks against me personally, I would call it more of an aggravation than a crisis. It is the demonstration and consequence of the situational uniting and stirring up of different forces and particular persons—political outsiders if you will—who are out for revenge and the redistribution of power through unconstitutional means.

Unfortunately, all the attention their outlandish charges are gaining in the West has emboldened them to think that they can threaten even the most considerable achievements of our Ukrainian nation, which are independence and sovereignty. Their ambition is to gain power for themselves. Yet, as you would say, the proof is in the pudding.

Domestically, which with all due respect, is the political realm to which I am responsible, these people cannot find support.

As to the so called "demonstrations" which have been well reported in the West, a few thousand paid participants in these protests do not have the key role and do not determine the general frames of mind of the Ukrainian people. In fact, things in this regard seem to have peaked on March 9. This has no doubt frightened the agitators, which is the very reason why they are trying to internationalize their cause.

However, I would be insincere if I do not say that artificial, purposeful, and excess politicization does not weaken our country and its ability to tackle the huge social and economic problems we face.

My office shall never submit to the influence of such provocations and shall not strengthen these pseudo-oppositionists.

Mr. President, the question of NATO membership for your country continues to be a point of friction between NATO, the Russian Federation, and Ukraine. It seems as though your administration has decided to back off from this initiative, at least for now. Does this mean that your country is more interested in improved relations with the Russian Federation, perhaps at the expense of the West?

I strongly object to the way you have raised this question.

Ukraine has always been consistent in its interest in cooperating with NATO. The beginning of the relations' development between Ukraine and the Atlantic alliance was made right after our country achieved its independence. Let me remind you that I signed the charter on special partnerships between Ukraine and NATO in 1997.

Cooperation between Ukraine and NATO has been progressing and covers a wide range of military and defense industries. One of the key elements of the cooperation remains our participation in the joint Ukrainian-Polish battalion and Ukrainian helicopter platoons are acting now within the contingent of peacemaking forces in Kosovo.

Speaking of the possibility of membership of Ukraine in the NATO alliance, my more direct answer to your question is that while we are increasing our cooperation with elements of NATO and the alliance, we are not ready to consider membership yet. Unilateral political announcements about our interest or readiness for implementation would be premature and harmful to the alliance and my country.

We are not reorienting our political outlook as you tried to suggest.

Ukraine looks forward to integrating itself in the European direction as a strategic option, while at the same time maintaining good relations with all our neighboring countries, including those in the East.

You have enjoyed notably good relations with all five of the Israeli prime ministers with whom you have worked. Knowing the troubled history of Ukrainian-Jewish relations, do you view this association as an attempt at national reconciliation or rather as a national strategic interest? In your view, is it necessary for Ukraine to actively pursue reconciliation with Israel and/or the Jewish people?

I am very proud of the excellent relations between our two great countries and my good relations with all of your elected leaders. I had a particularly close relationship with Yitzhak Rabin and I considered it a great honor to attend his funeral.

Earlier this year already I was delighted to receive the president of the State of Israel, Moshe Katsav, who has become my sincere friend. I am confident that President Katsav's visit will result in new understandings between our peoples.

Regarding your new prime minister, I am convinced that the heritage of this great son of the State of Israel will do all he can to help to lead the Middle East region to the peace and stability. Ariel Sharon is known in Ukraine as a experienced statesman and military leader, and as a wise person. He is very highly regarded. I hope that the policy of his government will continue on its path of working to achieve the goal sought by the Jewish people for countless generations—a prosperous, secure, and stable Jewish state at peace with its neighbors.

In my letter of congratulation to then prime minister-elect Sharon I reaffirmed the readiness of Ukraine to follow our two countries' recent tradition of excellent bilateral relations and close cooperation.

Currently, the scope of our cooperation with Israel is quite extensive. I look forward to working with Prime Minister Sharon to even further expand our already expansive commercial relations.

Let's not forget the fact that nearly 400,000 of the roughly one million recent immigrants to Israel from the republics of the former Soviet Union are from Ukraine. This alone is reason for a special relationship between our countries. That so many of our former countrymen have decided to make Israel their new home makes our concern about the political situation in your region more acute. Terrorism and violence that create distrust and hostility are especially dangerous and inadmissible. It is a dead end. I said as much in my recent message to Chairman Arafat, imploring him to do all in his power to curb violent demonstrations and to resume his fight against extremist organizations.

At the request of President Katsav, I have instructed our Foreign Affairs Ministry to take all possible measures to help win the release of the Israeli servicemen kidnapped by Hizbullah.

Our country also recognizes the right of the Palestinian people to an independent state of their own. Yet we believe that his nation can only come into being as a result of negotiations.

Your previous answer would likely come as a surprise to many of our readers. The extent of your country's relationship with Israel, its support for Israel, its commitment to the peace process, these things are largely unknown. Why do you suppose that is? Do you think it may have something to do with the troubled history of our people?

Well, you are probably in a better position to answer that than I am.

Another point to make regards our recent decision, as president of the United Nations Security Council. Our delegation did not support the resolution, subsequently vetoed by the United States, which would have mandated an international "peacekeeping" force for deployment in Palestinian areas. We did not believe such a step was wise or helpful.

To the contrary. Recent events have only reinforced the fact that peace can only be achieved by the parties themselves. Solutions cannot be imposed upon them. But Ukraine also recognizes and supports the need to give great weight to the positions expressed by the international community.

After independence, the priority for Ukraine was to consolidate its authority and international recognition and obtain the attributes of statehood. Generally we succeeded. Most important in our view was developing good working relations with the United States and the European Union. This took more effort than that required to establish relations with our eastern neighbors since we have lived and worked with them for centuries. This wasn't the case with Western countries.

This year marks the 60th anniversary of Nazi invasion of Ukraine, then part of the Soviet Union, and the destruction of nearly one million Ukrainian Jews. More than 100,000 of those Jews were murdered not five miles from here at a place called Babi Yar. As this awful date approaches what commemorative events are planned in Ukraine?

Yes, Kiev is the sight of one of the most tragic crimes in the whole history of man. Compounding the enormity of the crime was an attempt on the part of the Soviet authorities who ruled Ukraine until our independence to conceal what really happened here. Early last year, I authorized the establishment of the "Days of Memory of the Victims of Babi Yar for the year 2001."

For the 60th anniversary of the tragedy we will be dedicating an edition of The Holocaust Encyclopedia, a book of memories and an album. Under the same perspective the opening performances for the plays of the leading theaters of the country, and the series of TV and radio programs are in their final preparations. We will be publishing speeches of famous writers, cultural and art workers, scientists, and war veterans.

I would like to repeat one more time: We consider it a sacred obligation to respect the memory of the Jewish victims who perished.

Economic development is key to Ukraine's admission to the European Union. However, as you have mentioned, your country is not yet able to attract the amount of foreign investment you say you need. What industries or specific projects are you trying to promote as significant sources of Western capital and/or management? Perhaps, more importantly from the investors' point of view, what kinds of protections can you offer them? What guarantees can you provide regarding legal procedures? What about nationalizations? How can an investor be sure the economic landscape can't or won't change radically?

While not as fast as we would like our economy is still growing. Our high GDP and industrial production growth rates in the last year and in the first months of this year should reassure everyone. They have been very impressive, particularly when contrasted with the Western slowdown.

Increasing foreign investment is critical to our development plans. Our estimates are for investment inflows of at least $30 billion.

To help facilitate this necessary migration of capital, Ukraine is implementing the largest-ever privatization processes in the spheres of power, engineering, communications, and agriculture. This gives our international partners, including those from Israel, wonderful and exciting opportunities. I will dare say that Ukraine is one of the most exciting and opportunity-rich markets on earth.

We have developed special economic zones of priority development with reduced regulatory and tax regimens. The total area of these zones makes up more than 10 percent of our country's territory. Here, investors are granted special tax advantages, including discounts for value added tax, income duties, and other levies. These zones already host more than 400 projects financed by foreign investors. But this is just the beginning.

Opportunities extend to woodworking, pulp and paper, engineering, metalworking, fuels and chemicals, oil and gas, transportation, metallurgy; construction, shipbuilding; the list is quite literally endless. But having said all this, there is one area that calls for special attention and that is agriculture. Owing to the intensive market reforms, almost all our collective and Soviet farms have been restructured into private market businesses.

Our national tax burden has been dramatically reduced to the point where it is now roughly one-fifth of the tax burden found in an OECD country. If these are not competitive advantages, then I don't know what are.

As for your question about nationalization, let me say that foreign investors in Ukraine are as well protected here as anywhere in Eastern Europe. We have binding bilateral agreements to this effect with more than 50 countries, including Israel. Our national legislature includes guarantees on the inviolability of rights and parity conditions of national and foreign investors. In particular, even if some changes are introduced into the present legislation in the course of 10 years, guarantees that were in effect before will be used upon request of the foreign investor. Foreign capital in Ukraine is not subject to nationalization. Furthermore, foreign investors actually have the right to obtain compensation from the state in the event state actions result in financial losses.

For media companies like ours that may consider entering your market, what assurances can you provide regarding press freedom in Ukraine?

The economic advantage I described before are as applicable to foreign media investors as they are to foreign construction engineers.

Today we have more than 10,000 periodicals of all shapes, sizes, and opinions published in Ukraine. Our constitution elevates ideological diversity, forbids censorship, and guarantees free speech and association rights to every citizen.

But you must remember, we are a new country and a new democracy. This actually means we need more help than other, more developed democracies.

When we are talking about press freedom, it is critical to remember that independent publications belong to people and/or companies, some of whom express themselves through clannish, corporate, or private interests and ambitions, which doesn't necessarily benefit anyone other than themselves.

The President's Decree states that a newspaper can only be closed by the person who owns it, founded it, or if our judicial system deems it has broken the law. In other words, in our country, just like yours, we do have laws and we demand that all citizens, private and corporate, adhere to them. Any person or company who obeys the law and pays his taxes has nothing to worry about.

2001 CONGRESSIONAL CLASSROOM

HON. DAN MILLER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. MILLER of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a minute to recognize the students of the 2001 Congressional Classroom from my district in Florida. One student from the junior class of each of the participating high schools in my district was selected competitively to participate in the program here in Washington, DC.

Throughout the week, the students had the opportunity to meet with several of my fellow colleagues in the House of Representatives, as well as Florida Senators BOB GRAHAM and BILL NELSON, and Justice Antonin Scalia of the United States Supreme Court. The students also had the opportunity to meet with Dan Goldin, Director of NASA; Elaine Chao, Secretary of Labor; and Dr. Francis Collins, Director of the Human Genome Institute at the National Institutes of Health. The Congressional Classroom program also included an important trip through history with a visit to the National Holocaust Museum.

The Congressional Classroom program is a superb opportunity for young people to learn more about the United States Government, and provides them with a first hand account of the persons and institutions that comprise our government. It is always an honor and a pleasure to share this experience with young people, as it is a learning experience for the students as well as myself. Keeping in touch with the issues that affect the future generations of this nation is crucial to maintaining the spirit and effectiveness of our government.

I would like to thank the teachers, parents, staff, and all of my distinguished colleagues who so generously donated their time and effort to make this program a success. I wish the best of luck to all the students who participated, and that they can continue to have a powerful and positive influence on their communities and the world.

Finally, I would like to congratulate the participants of the 2001 Congressional Classroom:

Will Butler, Saint Stephens School; Brad Chase, Pine View High School; Lisamaris Countinho, Cardinal Mooney, Phil Crouse, Out of Door Academy; Griff Dalrymple, Bayshore High School; Emme Edwards, Palmetto High School; Jim Ganey, Bradenton Academy; Matt Hipps, Lemon Bay; Rebecca Janiak, Port Charlotte High School; Caitlyn Miller, Sarasota High School; Meghan Mills, Riverview High School; Ashley Palmer, Manatee High School; Marc Phillips, Bradenton Christian; Nick Richmond, Southeast High School; Anna Rule, Booker High School; Matt Rzepa, Lakewood Ranch; Nick Sadulski, Venice High School.

Ms. BERKLEY. Mr. Speaker, due to inclement weather, my flight was late which is why I missed rollcall votes No. 126 and No. 127. Had I been present, I would have voted "yea" on No. 126 and "yea" on No. 127.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

U.S. DISPLACEMENT FROM THE U.N. HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION

HON. DAVID DREIER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. DREIER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take this opportunity to introduce into the RECORD, the following statement to the Canadian Senate by the Honorable Jerry S. Grafstein, Q.C. regarding the United States' displacement from the U.N. Human Rights Commission. Senator Grafstein cochaired the 42nd meeting of the U.S.-Canada Interparliamentary Group held last weekend.

Senator Grafstein's remarks address the important role the United States has played over the last century in the evolution of international rule of law and leadership in projecting a human rights agenda around the world. I hope that my colleagues will take to heart the encouraging comments of Senator Grafstein.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable Senators, next week Parliament is co-hosting the forty-second annual meeting of the Canada-U.S. Interparliamentary Group in Western Canada. As Canadian co-chair, I have pondered the role of the United States with respect to Canada. Yet who can fail to consider the United States' paramount role in the evolution of international rule of law and American leadership in projecting a human rights agenda around the globe in the last century? Therefore, it came as no small shock when we discovered two weeks ago that the European bloc, led by France, and the Asian bloc, led by China, were successful in displacing the United States as a sitting member of the UN Commission on Human Rights for the first time since its creation in 1947.

Honourable senators may recall that it was due to the efforts of Eleanor Roosevelt that this commission was first established. Now, instead of the United States, we have France, Sweden and Austria representing the North American and European bloc. Other nations, those exemplars of human rights nations, include Algeria, China, Saudi Arabia, Uganda, Armenia, Pakistan, Syria and Vietnam.

It is regrettable that the staunchest promoter of human rights around the globe has been displaced, not because of its failure to promote a human rights agenda but, rather, primarily because it has forced the international community to confront human rights in a way that no other region, block or nation has been prepared to project so singularly and so consistently. Only the United States publishes annually a region-by-region analysis of nations that fall below international human rights norms.

Honourable senators, may I recommend that you read a very short book entitled On The Law of Nations by former U.S. Senator Daniel Moynihan. It gives an extraordinary account of the role that international law has played in the foreign policy of the United States. It is a primer for all those who are interested in the rule of law in international relations.

Returning to the exclusion of the United States from the United Nations Human Rights Commission, I can best sum up by quoting these words from another antique senator that express for me the current situation: O tempora! O mores!

TRIBUTE TO JAMES F. HETTINGER FOR HIS SERVICE TO THE CITIZENS OF GREATER BATTLE CREEK

HON. NICK SMITH

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 24, 2001

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor Mr. James Hettinger for over 20 years of dedicated service to the citizens of greater Battle Creek, MI.

Today, Thursday, May 24, 2001, the citizens of Battle Creek, MI will gather to pay tribute to a man who's efforts over the past twenty-three years led to the formation and expansion of one of the nation's premier industrial parks, and the economic rebirth of a community.

As Chief Executive Officer of Battle Creek Unlimited, the marketing and economic development arm of the City of Battle Creek, Jim has served as an excellent ambassador for the community, touting the positive attributes of locating facilities in the Cereal City to businesses around the world. To date, his efforts have led to the decision by approximately two dozen international companies to locate in the Fort Custer Industrial Park, resulting in over 3,000 jobs.

Jim has forged cooperative agreements with surrounding communities in an effort to spur economic growth beyond the boundaries of the city. He has been a driving force behind countless critical projects in the area including: the establishment of an inland U.S. Customs Port of Entry and Foreign Trade Zone 43; the retention of hundreds of jobs at the Battle Creek Federal Center; the relocation of the Western Michigan University College of Aviation to Battle Creek, and most recently, the forging of an innovative e-learning agreement with the Canadian province of New Brunswick.

Jim is among the most highly regarded economic development professionals in the country. And with good reason. He holds a Ph.D in Public Administration and Comparative Government and serves as an Adjunct Professor at Western Michigan University. He has published fifteen articles dealing with local government and economic development as well as a book on economic development and Japanese manufacturing investment. His work has been cited in numerous national publications including The Wall Street Journal, Business Week, The New York Times and USA Today. He is a past recipient of the MI Economic Developer of the Year award and the Kiwanis International Person of the Year award, as well as being named to the Oxford Elite Registry of Extraordinary Professionals.

I am honored to recognize Jim Hettinger for his tremendous dedication both to his profession and to his community, and join with the citizens of Battle Creek in congratulating him on this special day.

SENATE—Friday, May 25, 2001

The Senate met at 10 a.m. and was called to order by the Honorable GEORGE ALLEN, a Senator from the State of Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Today's prayer will be offered by our guest Chaplain, Father Paul Lavin, of St. Joseph's Catholic Church, Washington, DC.

PRAYER

The guest Chaplain offered the following prayer:

In the book of the prophet Amos, the Lord tells us:

I hate and despise your feasts,
I want none of your burnt offerings.
Let me have no more of the din of your chanting,
No more of your strumming on harps.
But let justice flow like water,
And integrity like an unfailing stream.

Let us pray.

Lord God, we praise You and bless You for the many gifts You have given to the United States, and for the gifts You have given to the men and women who serve in the Senate. Let our feasts be to come to the aid of the poor and the oppressed. Let our song be to practice justice, and let our sacrifice be the offering of a humble and contrite heart. Then, when our lips sing Your praise, You will listen to our song. Amen.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The Honorable GEORGE ALLEN led the Pledge of Allegiance, as follows:

I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

The Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. WELLSTONE. I thank the Chair.

STEEL REVITALIZATION ACT

Mr. WELLSTONE. Mr. President, I rise to speak in support of the Steel Revitalization Act of 2001. This is the companion measure to H.R. 808 which, as of this moment, has 189 cosponsors in the House of Representatives. The measure represents a comprehensive approach to a serious crisis which is facing our domestic iron ore and steel industry.

Several of the provisions contained in this act are ones that my colleagues in the bipartisan Steel Caucus have introduced in the Senate. I particularly thank Senators ROCKEFELLER and SPECTER for their work in cochairing this caucus, and Senator BYRD for his unflinching support of the entire steel industry and his creative efforts on behalf of the industry's working families. A special thank you to Senator ROCKEFELLER, who has been absolutely the leader on this issue.

The Steel Revitalization Act includes the following components:

First, there is import relief. We go back to a 5-year period of quantitative restrictions on the import of iron ore. We go back prior to the import surge in 1997. We go to a 3-year average. That is where we hold the line. Between February and March, 2001, there was a 40-percent surge in the import of steel or semifinished steel, way under the cost of production, constituting unfair trade and putting people out of work.

Second, there is creation of a steelworker retiree health care fund which is administered by the steelworker retiree health care board at the Department of Labor. This fund would be underwritten through a 1.5-percent surcharge on the sale of all steel products in the United States, both imported and domestic.

One of the awful things about what is going on is many of the retirees worked their whole life, thought they had health care coverage, and are terrified they will not have the health care coverage. A 70-year-old struggling with cancer now is worried there will be no health care coverage.

Third, we have the enhancement of the current Steel Loan Guarantee Program which provides the steel companies greater access to funds needed to invest in capital improvements to take advantage of the latest technological advancements.

Finally, we have the creation of a $500 million grant program at the Department of Commerce to help defray the costs of environmental mitigation and the restructuring as a result of consolidation—again, assuming these companies make a commitment to invest in our country; again, assuming these companies make a commitment to the workers.

I think all Senators can appreciate this legislation. The Iron Range of Minnesota, and if you think of our sister State of Michigan, this is a part of the United States of America with a proud history of providing key raw materials to the producers of steel for well over a century. In these taconite mines are some of the hardest working people you ever want to meet. LTV has closed down in Hoyt Lakes; 1,400 miners lost their work. They are steelworkers, but they work in the mines. These were good, middle-class jobs. It is not just these workers who have lost their jobs; it has the ripple effect on all the small businesses, all the subcontractors, all the suppliers—all the families.

I am in schools all the time. There is such pain, such concern about the future of these families and concern for the future of their children. From my point of view, and I know I speak for Senator DAYTON, there is probably not a more important piece of legislation to introduce.

The introduction of a piece of legislation is not symbolic politics. It does not mean it passes. We have a lot of work cut out for us, but I will say to my colleague from Virginia, I thank publicly on the floor of the Senate—I certainly have called her—Secretary of Labor Chao. We are, again, in a situation right now where there is a lot of economic pain, a lot of economic desperation. The Secretary of Labor has provided the workers up there with at least some relief, which was extremely important. We were so hopeful we could get trade adjustment assistance benefits. The Secretary of Labor granted us an additional year, above and beyond unemployment benefits that workers receive through the State of Minnesota.

It is additional money for job relocation. For workers and their families to get that trade adjustment assistance is a lifeline. It gives them more time. It gives them an opportunity to think about what ladder there is for career development. It gives them some financial assistance for their families. I have told Secretary Chao—I don't know if I will get her in trouble with the administration by being so glowing about what I have to say about her—I so appreciate it and so do the people in the State of Minnesota. I want to publicly thank her.

I also want to say we are now waiting, of course, for the administration on a decision—Secretary Evans will make a decision soon—as to whether or not we will be taking some trade action to really make sure we have a future for this industry. The next big decision is going to be in mid-June about whether or not the taconite workers on the Iron Range in Minnesota are going to have a future. This industry will not survive if it is continually faced with unfair trade practices, if it continues to face this import surge of slab or finished steel. Our taconite workers on the Iron Range of Minnesota ask nothing more than to have a level playing field. We wait for a decision mid-June.

I think steelworkers and industrial workers all across the country—and I think they will have a lot of allies—will in a strong voice say you have to take some action. For the Iron Range in Minnesota, northeast Minnesota, time is not neutral. Time moves on. It is extremely important, above and beyond this lifeline assistance, that we get serious about a fair trade policy so these workers and their families have a future.

There is companion legislation in the House. Very important work has been done by Senator ROCKEFELLER and Senator SPECTER. I think we can get some strong bipartisan support, but it is not going to be enough to just introduce a bill. We will need action from the administration and we will need legislative action if there is to be a future for this extremely important industry—which, by the way, I think is essential to our national security.

This legislation is legislation near and dear to my heart because it is so connected to the lives and people I truly love, that is to say the steelworkers and their families on the Iron Range of the State of Minnesota.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will please call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent the order for the quorum call be dispensed with.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DORGAN. I ask consent to speak in morning business for 15 minutes.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota is recognized.

OUR TRADE DEFICIT

Mr. DORGAN. I want to speak this morning about international trade and our growing and troubling trade deficit. In March, the merchandise trade deficit surprised economists, jumping to $37.6 billion in that month alone. That is the latest month for which we have data. In March imports into this country increased to $101 billion, while American exports decreased to $64 billion.

This is a very serious problem. The trade deficit continues to balloon. We had a $450 billion merchandise trade deficit last year and it continues to grow and grow. It increases our indebtedness in this country. Unlike a budget deficit, about which economists over strong coffee can make the point that we owe to ourselves, you cannot make the point that our trade deficit is owed to ourselves. It is owed to others outside this country and will be and must be repaid one day with a lower cost of living in this country. We must get a handle on this exploding trade deficit.

Let me speak to one portion of the trade issue. We are about to see the administration take a step that I vigorously oppose. I am going to offer a piece of legislation today on behalf of myself and my colleague from Nevada, Senator REID, that deals with the issue of Mexican trucks entering this country under the provisions of NAFTA, the North American Free Trade Agreement.

What is the issue? We signed a free trade pact with the country of Mexico. It has not turned out very well, as a matter of fact. We had a trade surplus with Mexico when we signed the trade pact. Now we have a $24 billion trade deficit with Mexico. So we went from a surplus to a very large and exploding deficit with Mexico.

But one aspect of the trade pact with Mexico is the question of movement of goods and individuals back and forth across the boarder and especially the question of Mexican trucks coming into this country. President Clinton, I believe in violation of NAFTA, prescribed a 20-mile zone in which Mexican trucks could haul goods into this country for trade purposes. But they could not go beyond that zone. This administration is about to lift that and provide unrestricted access into this country for Mexican trucks. My legislation will say that is not possible, we will not allow that to happen until and unless the Administration implements certain safeguards to protect those who use America's highways.

Let me describe why this is important. Do you want to drive down a highway in this country and drive next to a Mexican truck that is pulling double the load we allow pulled in this country behind our trucks, driven by a driver who is making less than the minimum wage in this country—on average, incidentally, of $7- to $10-a-day salary for that Mexican truck driver; a truck that has not been inspected in most cases, if inspected, not inspected to the same standards to which we inspect trucks in this country?

This is a circumstance where the Mexican trucks are determined to be unsafe at the border crossings at which the trucks are inspected. In many cases, 40 percent are turned back because they are unsafe, do not meet standards. Is that what we want to have on American highways? I don't think so.

This is what has happened. Mexico threatened, under NAFTA, to sue the U.S. for billions of dollars per year in compensation if the U.S. did not lift this longstanding control on allowing Mexican commercial truckers to operate within the United States. President Bush has agreed to allow them to operate in the United States beyond the limit, even though the Department of Transportation says it cannot certify the safety of any, except a tiny fraction, of the Mexican trucks that enter this country.

This month, in fact, the Department of Transportation's own inspector general concluded that the Department of Transportation's enforcement program cannot reasonably assure the American people of the safety of Mexican trucks entering this country.

Barely 1 percent of the 3.7 million Mexican trucks that enter into the United States are inspected. Of those inspected, 36 percent are declared out of service for serious safety violations. At the border crossing in El Paso, TX, there are 1,300 trucks that come across every single day. One inspector is on duty—one—and he or she can inspect about 10 to 14 trucks a day. Most inspectors work only during daylight hours, leaving crossings with no inspectors at all during much of the day.

Now Mexico still lags far behind the United States when it comes to truck safety. They do not have an effective drug and alcohol testing program for truck drivers as we do. They simply do not have it. They have no hours-of-service regulations and only recently proposed the use of logbooks for hours of service. A reporter from the San Francisco Chronicle recently drove with a Mexican truck driver. They drove 20 to 21 hours straight—20 to 21 hours. That is significant and also dangerous. That cannot happen legally in this country. I do not want that driver on the road next to my family or my neighbors or my friends or anyone else in this country who is driving.

Right now there is no way for American law enforcement agencies to access a database containing information on Mexican truckers. If a police officer pulls me over to the side of the road or pulls the Presiding Officer, from the State of Virginia, over to the side of the road, and asks to see our license, they can put that name into a database. They can figure out very quickly what we have or have not done, what is on our driving record and what isn't. If the same police officer pulls over a Mexican truck driver, he will not find any information on him because it does not exist.

Despite these unresolved issues, and despite all of these facts and figures, despite the written objections of 258 Members of the House and 48 Senators, on both sides of the aisle, the administration has said that the NAFTA trucking provisions should be implementing. They are wrong. The provisions should not be implemented until and unless we can demonstrate safety for the American people by allowing these trucks into this country. If we cannot demonstrate safety—and clearly we cannot at this point—they should not be allowed in.

I am introducing legislation to prohibit the administration from granting operation rights to Mexican motor carriers until we can ensure that they meet the safety standards we require in this country. My bill would require the implementation of inspections and the deployment of needed resources to ensure that the trucks that would come in would meet basic safety standards.

This is not some issue where one can say: These people are antitrade, and therefore they want to stop trucks from this country or that country. This is very real. Every day, every hour, we have massive numbers of trucks coming into this country. There is evidence from California and New Mexico and from Arizona. The evidence of the number of trucks turned back for serious safety violations is overwhelming.

Mexico does not have the same standards. Their drivers can drive 20 hours a day and no one will know it. They have no logbooks. They have no drug testing. They do not have the same equipment standards as we do. It demonstrates, in my judgment, the concern that many of us have about this unfettered notion of opening up borders without making sure we have adequate safety in place for the American people. I am going to introduce this legislation on behalf of myself and my colleague, Senator REID, from the State of Nevada. And other colleagues I know will join us because there are nearly 50 Members of the Senate who have expressed their reservations about this issue.

I urge the administration to reconsider this issue. Change your mind about this. The American people don't want to be driving down a highway to pull up next to an 18-wheel truck that is hauling a load that is twice as heavy as that which could be hauled by an American trucker in this country, with a driver who has been driving 20 hours, who has never been drug tested, and driving equipment that doesn't meet safety specifications on American roads. That is not what we want on American roads and not what we want for the safety of the American people.

Mr. President, I am happy to yield to my colleague from Nevada.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada, Mr. REID.

Mr. REID. I am very happy to join with my colleague from North Dakota on this most important legislation. He has outlined very clearly the problems we have.

Let's think about this. In the United States there are 400,000 trailer truck accidents every year. Keep in mind, we have pretty strong, strict safety standards. Over 14,000 of those accidents involve hazardous materials. Do we want to add to that mix unsafe vehicles?

The trucks that have accidents in America that are American trucks are not unsafe. Those accidents are caused by driver errors, weather conditions.

We need to move forward on this legislation yesterday, not today. I certainly hope, through administrative fiat, that the President does not allow this to happen. That is our fear. That is what we have heard.

The Senator from North Dakota is really a visionary as far as legislation goes, on what he has focused in making statements in this Chamber, what he has done as a Senator, and what he has done as a Member of the House, focusing attention on our trade deficits. It is a stealth monster. Ultimately, if we do not do something about it, it is going to destroy the economy of this country. It is getting bigger and bigger and bigger. As the Senator has outlined with the chart he has behind him, this balloon is going to continue to get bigger and bigger and thinner and thinner and finally explode. I say he is a visionary because he has talked about our trade situation. This legislation in regard to dangerous trucks is excellent legislation.

Also, we have an amendment pending on the education bill that I think says it all. What it says is we should have the House and the Senate have a joint committee and convene immediately to determine what is happening with the gasoline and fuel prices in this country.

They expect in California, which is a neighboring State to Nevada, that the price of gasoline will be $3 a gallon this year. If we can inspect and investigate the price of chickens, can't we investigate the price of gasoline? Yes, we can.

So I say to my friend from North Dakota, I hope that when that amendment comes up—which was written by the Senator from North Dakota and on which I happily joined as a cosponsor—it is adopted overwhelmingly. I also acknowledge and appreciate his authoring the legislation that deals with these trucks, in which I happily join.

Also, as an aside, I tell him how much I appreciate him being one of the lone voices who talks continually about the dangers of this burgeoning debt we have in the form of a trade debt. It is just as dangerous as any debt we have. We need to do something about it. But it is a difficult issue to understand. It is in the background and people really don't focus on it. I appreciate very much the Senator not letting us not focus on it.

Mr. DORGAN. I thank the Senator from Nevada.

I have a couple minutes remaining. Let me point out what is happening with our trade deficit.

As you can see: With Canada, our trade deficit has dramatically increased from 1999 to 2000; China, $83 billion merchandise trade deficit in a year; European Union, $55 billion; Japan $81 billion. Japan, a $50 billion-plus trade deficit for us almost forever. Mexico—this used to be a surplus, incidentally—now the trade deficit is $24 billion-plus.

We cannot continue to do that. We just cannot continue to run up these kinds of trade deficits.

Just for a moment, let me describe some of the circumstances of the trade deficit. When we want to ship apples into Japan, they say the apples must come from trees that are separated at least 500 feet from apples on apple trees in the orchard that are not going to be shipped to Japan. So if we are going to ship apples to Japan, they have to be in a grove 500 feet away from other apple groves. What kind of sense is that?

We ship T-bone steaks to Japan. Guess what the tariff is after 12 years of an agreement. Twelve years after an agreement with them, the tariff is 38.5 percent on beef going into Japan.

In Korea, just as an example, we exported 4,400 cars last year. They exported 470,000 to us. One might ask the question, Where is the fair trade here? Where is the reciprocal treatment? This country needs to demand of its trading partners that they open their markets to us so we can have fair trade.

Our deficit with China is going up, up, way up. It is now $83.8 billion. We take all their trousers and shirts and tennis shoes and jeans. They ship them into our country, and guess what. When we try to penetrate the Chinese market, we get a pitiful amount of exports into China.

People say: Hoorah, it is increasing. Hoorah, it is increasing at a minuscule level, and we have an $83 billion deficit with them. We have to change that.

I have other things to say.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. DORGAN. I ask for 30 additional seconds.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DORGAN. The President says he now wants fast-track trade authority. Fast-track trade authority to do more of this? Not on my watch. Let's have some trade authority that says when we do trade agreements in the future, we do them on behalf of this country's best interests. Maybe we should put some jerseys on those trade negotiators that read: USA. We do that for the Olympians. How about doing it for trade negotiators so they remember for whom they are negotiating.

My legislation on Mexican trucking is very important. I encourage my colleagues to cosponsor it.

Mr. President, I yield the remainder of my time.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, there will now be 30 minutes under the control of the Senator from Wyoming, Mr. THOMAS, or his designee.

Mr. DORGAN. Might I ask the Senator from Wyoming if he will yield for a question?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. DORGAN. I ask the Senator from Wyoming if he would allow me to propound a unanimous consent request that at the conclusion of his 30 minutes, I have the floor for another brief statement in morning business? I believe his time will run until 11 o'clock. I ask unanimous consent that I be recognized at that time.

Mr. THOMAS. I have no objection to that.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Alabama.

GOOD NEWS

Mr. SESSIONS. Mr. President, some good news came out this week. I don't know how many people saw it. It was a report of the status of the surplus in our accounts for the United States. As it was reported in the Wall Street Journal and other organizations, for the month of April of this year, the surplus was $30 billion larger than the surplus for April of last year. For the first 4 months of this year, it showed that the surplus was $41 billion larger than the surplus of the first 4 months last fiscal year.

That is a rather significant event because we are in an economic slowdown. As everyone knows, a vibrant economy is the greatest motivator for creating surpluses.

There is a lot of fear out there that we may not continue to have surpluses. Since I have been in the Senate, going on my fifth year now, every projection on the status of the budget has understated the income to the Federal Government. For the last 3 years, the surplus has substantially exceeded what OMB and the Congressional Budget Office have projected for the surplus.

To me, we have one goal as a Congress and a Government: To try to make sure this economy gets on its feet again and gets humming and makes even more money for the taxpayers and for individual Americans. But at the same time, we have to look at what is happening.

The good news is that even in a time of slowdown, we have a real surplus churning out there. We have gone from a gross domestic product take by the Federal Government of 17.6 percent of GDP to 20.6 percent of GDP. The Government is taking a larger and larger percentage of American wealth to fund governmental programs.

That is a historic change. It may not sound like much to go from 17.6 to 20.6, but 20.6 represents the highest amount we have taken from the American economy for the Government since the height of World War II.

What is at work here is an opportunity for the American people to say: Great, we are paying down this debt in record numbers. We are paying down all debt that can be paid down without a penalty being paid on it. We are doing the right thing as far as debt is concerned. We are setting aside money for contingencies, $500 billion or so for contingencies. That is extra spending.

Remember, this surplus is calculated above inflation. When they figured how much the surplus would be, they figured in that the Government would increase spending at the rate of inflation every year. So we have the rate of inflation in there, another $500 billion for extra spending, and we are paying down debt at record numbers.

It is time for us to have at least this $1.35 trillion tax cut. We can do that. If we do not do that, we will spend more, and we will continue to take more of the overall wealth of the American economy. It will move us into a system such as those that exist in Europe that some in this body admire and want for us.

Our economy is more vibrant. Our economy is more productive. Our people have better health care and better incomes than Europeans. Our unemployment rate is lower by and large than our competitors, even though they have so many good things to offer their people.

We are on the right track. I am pleased with where we are today. Nothing could give me greater anticipation than within hours, perhaps, we will be able to send to the President of the United States a piece of legislation that will represent perhaps the largest tax cut in over 20 years, that could allow him to fulfill the promise on which he was elected to allow the American people to keep a larger portion of their wealth, to be able to spend it on their needs for their families, and for their children.

It is a great day. I am excited about it. I hope the conferees can complete their work promptly and we can bring that bill to the floor and we can make it law promptly.

I yield the floor.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming, Mr. THOMAS.

TAXES

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I rise to talk about taxes, which is the focus of where we are, and prior to that, to mention that despite all the discussions we have had about certain issues, this Senate has accomplished quite a bit in the several months we have been in session. That is our task; we ought to be doing that.

A number of things have happened. First of all, we abolished the Clinton ergonomics regulation. We used a technique that allows the Congress to bring back regulations that are put in and to review them, which, quite frankly, is something we ought to be able to do on all regulations. I come from Wyoming. I was in the Wyoming Legislature. There, when you have a statute passed by the legislature, the rules are then put in by the appropriate agency, and those rules come back to the legislature to see if, indeed, they are consistent with the purpose of the legislation.

That doesn't happen in the Congress. It is too bad. You can pass a law, and by the time the regulations are in, the concepts under the law can be quite different. In any event, this one was brought back on ergonomics. It was successfully overhauled in the Congress. That is good.

Of course, we approved a deficit reduction budget, a budget that still has more expenditures perhaps than we ought to have. But in any event, it probably is about a 5-percent increase, which is less than the increases of the past number of years—less because when you have a surplus, it is awfully hard to hold down spending. It was an appropriate thing to have this budget that does reflect at least some control in spending and we are pleased about that.

Of course, currently pending and perhaps the most important thing we will do in a very long time will be the tax reduction that is now being considered by committee. It has passed the Senate as well as the House. And when the conference committee completes their work, it will be back here for consideration. We are anxious for that to happen.

The Bankruptcy Reform Act was passed as well. We had brownfields revitalization, which is something that has gone on for a very long time that allows lands to be put back into use more easily. We have construction of a memorial honoring World War II and those who served there. We have intellectual property, a number of things that are quite important and that have, in fact, been achieved during this relatively short time.

So we are looking forward to that. But in the meantime, I am going to soon yield the floor to my friend from Idaho. I believe one of the most important bills we will be passing in this session of the Congress is the bill to cut tax rates across the board, bury the death tax, fix the marriage penalty, and double the child credit. We can do a lot to make this economy stronger, more fair, and to allow people to utilize more of their own money for the purposes upon which they decide.

I yield the floor.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho is recognized.

ENERGY POLICY

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. President, I thank the senior Senator from the State of Wyoming for yielding to me, and I thank him for his leadership on all of these many issues that he has discussed. He comes from a fascinating State, a State with a basket full of potential energy for this Nation if we can change a few of our policies and allow Wyoming, Montana, and other such States to be able to use the abundance of their coal to produce electricity at the mouth of the mine itself, and then through transmission lines to transport it across the Western States and to the State of California, where they are so desperately in need of more energy.

I say that in my opening comments because we are on the threshold of beginning to work on a national energy policy. The President has presented one. The Senate has produced a bill. The Energy Committee, on which I serve, will now begin to review all aspects of that proposed policy and begin to shape for our Nation new public laws, amended public laws, a new regulatory process, a reduced regulatory process that will allow this country, once again, after nearly a decade, to get back in the business of producing energy.

Senator THOMAS and I were downtown yesterday speaking to a group, and I, at that time, said we are a rich Nation. Compared with all other nations of the world, we are one of the most wealthy. It is because of a combination of assets that we have had and have uniquely combined in the American character.

First of all is the free enterprise system where an individual is allowed to create at his or her level and with his or her talent, and to use that creation not only to create wealth for themselves but for everyone around them.

That is probably the No. 1 resource in our country and always has been. But tied to that resource is an abundance of energy in almost all forms—electrical, hydrocarbon, you name it. We have never wanted for energy in our country. But today we do. The American public is paying a higher price for gas than at any time in our Nation's history. They are paying higher electrical rates than at any time in our Nation's history, and they are asking a fundamental question: Why? Why are we? Why do we have to?

Of course, we already know that those higher costs have depleted or reduced the wealth-generating capability of our country. It has cost thousands of jobs. It has hurt households. Every day, the commuter to his or her job is paying nearly double in the commuter costs than a year ago.

This country cries out for a new energy policy of production. But they also want to see it done in a clean and responsible way when it comes to the environment. All of those things can be accomplished if this Senate will put its mind to it to assuring that we make that happen, and that we partner with States and local governments to assure they are fully involved and engaged with us in this most important process.

A lot of people are saying right now: Well, George Bush, why aren't you helping out in California?

After about 20 decisions coming out of the new administration, 3 decisions coming out of the FERC, at some point we have to do the very common and necessary thing and say to California: Help yourself.

California, finally, is beginning to do that. They are beginning to recognize that after 10 long years of not producing any energy, they are going to have to produce some. They used to buy a lot of energy from Idaho. We used to ship a lot of energy down there. But we Idahoans now need our energy because we are growing. We also had a drought in the Western States of Idaho, Oregon, and Washington. We used to produce most of our power by turbines and dams and hydro power. As a result, this year we have less capability to produce and therefore we have less power to sell to California.

Those are some of the critically important dynamics of the policy we will have to develop in the Senate. I have already had some of my folks calling me from Idaho saying, with what happened yesterday and with Democrats taking control of the Senate, is the energy policy dead?

No, I don't think it will be. It can't be. My colleagues on the other side of the aisle cannot be viewed as obstructionists who are advocates of $2 or $3 gasoline or $400 or $500 megawatt power. They aren't now, and they can't be later. They must work with us and the Bush administration to get this country back into the business of producing and conserving and balancing out our electrical needs.

President Bush said: Give me a tax cut now and give me some immediate response so at least in the short term a consuming family will have just a little bit of relief in their energy bill or any other part of family expenses.

That is what we are struggling with at this very moment. The House and the Senate are meeting in conference to work out the differences between what we have produced in the Senate and what our colleagues in the House have produced. I hope in the end it will look very closely like what our President is asking—to return some of their tax dollars to them in the form of tax relief, both in the short term and in the long term, to stimulate the economy and to allow the producer to keep more of his or her hard-earned cash.

In the midst of all of that, for just a little bit of time, maybe they can afford to pay just a little more for energy. I wish they didn't. I wish we had been smart enough 10 years ago, 5 years ago, 4 years ago, to shift the policy. But we had an administration that said all you have to do is conserve and maybe use a little gas—that is, natural gas—to generate electricity, and we will get through all of this. We know that didn't work very well. Conservation was an important part of that energy message, and it is today.

The average consumer today is now making a choice. I heard on the television a couple of mornings ago that the American Automobile Association says consumers are going to travel less this summer. Instead of a 10-day trip in their automobile, they are going to take an 8-day trip or a 7-day trip. That is the American consumer doing what they do best—evaluating the cost of the trip and what they have in their pocketbooks and what their family can afford and stepping back.

It is OK to do that in the short term, but when it comes to industry and the creation of jobs and the fact that industry may have to produce less and step back because of the input cost of energy, that then begins to hurt the whole economy of our country.

So how can I talk about tax relief and energy in the same conversation? They are, in fact, integrally related. The ability to create a job, the ability to earn a paycheck, and to have a fair amount of that which you can apply to yourself, your family, and your kids' education has, in part, always been in direct relation to the amount it takes you to live; and the cost of living has gone up substantially in the last 2 years because of the fundamental cost of energy. All of these issues are tremendously important. Thank goodness we now have a President who speaks boldly, clearly, and bluntly about these kinds of issues.

He says we are in an energy crisis and we can get out of it if we simply produce and get back to the business of providing for the consumer of this country. He has laid out a plan on how to do it. On most of it, I agree. I certainly hope this Senate in future days, and under its new leadership, will recognize the importance of such a policy to the American people. You simply cannot deny it any longer. If conservation is the only message out there, then look at California, the greatest conserving State in the Nation. They have conserved themselves right into darkness. That is no way to run a State. They now know they have to produce along with that conservation, and we ought to allow this great country of ours that opportunity.

I have always been one who believed that the freer our citizens, the freer our economy, the more flexibility to do what we do best—generate this great country's wealth and, therefore, this great country's world presence.

Wealthy nations can provide for their people, and we do. Poor nations cannot. There is nothing wrong with the idea of creating wealth and allowing people to share it, allowing people to have the fruits of their labor and their genius. It is what has made us great, and it is what allows us to turn to those less fortunate here and around the world, to say we can help, and the only reason we can help is because we are, fortunately, a rich nation.

I yield the floor.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, my understanding is the next 8 minutes are under the control of the Senator from Wyoming, Mr. THOMAS. I ask unanimous consent that I be recognized, and in the event someone comes to whom Senator THOMAS wishes to yield that time, I will be happy to discontinue my comments.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from North Dakota is recognized.

ENERGY POLICY

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, my colleague from Idaho just discussed the energy issue. There is not any question the energy policy is a critical policy for this country. We must develop a national energy plan that makes sense for our long-term future.

Every American every day has a claim on the need for energy. We need a consistent, predictable supply of energy that is reasonably priced. We need a policy that allows that to happen. When the price of oil went to $10 a barrel for some long while, people stopped looking for oil and natural gas. It is pretty predictable. There were fewer rigs looking for oil when the price of oil and natural gas was very low. When the price of oil went up and natural gas spiked back up, there were more drilling rigs and more people are searching for more oil and natural gas. That is predictable. That is how the market system works.

It is not in this country's best interest to have a roller coaster of exploration, and that is what happens. That is what describes only part of our current problem with the imbalance between supply and demand for energy.

We are too dependent on the OPEC countries. All of us know that. One day we will wake up—I hope this is not the case—it is likely we will wake up when some grotesque terrorist act in the Middle East interrupts the supply of oil, even if temporarily, and it will allow us to understand how overly dependent we are on a source of energy and oil, natural gas from a region that is so unstable.

In addition to having this roller coaster on exploration and being overly dependent on a supply of energy from the Middle East, we also are a country that has largely decided to ignore conservation. One can drive down the road these days and see someone driving a new vehicle that looks a lot like a Humvee, except it is bigger and heavier and is sold at your local dealership as a family vehicle. People have a right to drive that, but the point is that is moving in the opposite direction of having a national conservation ethic.

It is true, as the Senator from Idaho said, that we must produce more. I do not think you will find Members of the Senate in disagreement on that. We must produce more oil and natural gas. We must use coal resources. There are ample resources in our coal fields. We can do it using clean coal technology. We must use our fossil fuels in a thoughtful way, and we can do that in a manner that is not inconsistent with a good and clean environment.

That is important, but it is also important to understand we just cannot produce ourselves out of this problem. We cannot produce our way out of this problem. We have a President and a Vice President who come from oil backgrounds so it is probably not surprising their energy plan is to just drill more. They have an easy solution to America's energy problem: Just drill more.

That is one approach, but it is not a balanced approach. Yes, we must produce more, and I support that, but we also must conserve more. Conservation of energy is another way of producing energy. We must have a conservation component that is real, not just talk, but real as we deal with this energy policy.

We also must have an efficiency process in this energy plan. All of the appliances, the things we use every day in our lives that make our lives better, easier, can be made more efficient and should be. We have efficiency standards. The question is whether we continue to press for greater efficiency in all of these appliances or not. The answer should be yes.

Finally, renewable resources. We ought to use renewable forms of energy, and I know the big oil companies have never liked that very much, but I happen to believe that using ethanol, taking a drop of alcohol from a kernel of corn and using it to extend our energy supply, makes good sense.

We can take a drop of alcohol from a kernel of corn and still have the protein feedstock left. So we have extended America's energy supply and we still have protein feedstock for animals. What a wonderful thing to do. Plus, it is renewable. We are not depleting it every year.

Wind energy. North Dakota happens to be the Saudi Arabia of wind, according to the Department of Energy. There is nothing wrong, as an important part of our energy plan, of putting up more efficient wind turbines and using that wind energy to extend America's energy supply.

It is true, as my colleague from Idaho says, we need to produce more, and all of us support that, but a balanced energy plan will include production, conservation, renewable energy, and also efficiency with appliances and the things we use day to day. If we have a bold energy plan that includes all of those components, I believe we will find a broad area of support for it in this Congress.

As I mentioned, we have a President and Vice President who come from the oil industry, so it is not unnatural for them to produce a plan that says: By the way, let's just drill more. But that is not a balanced plan. We can, should, and must do much better than that and have a plan that balances all of these interests.

And, finally, another thought on this issue of an energy plan. We have other dislocations occurring in this country in a very significant way. In California, the price of electricity is going through the roof. Some say that is supply and demand. That is nonsense. That market is broken. It is flat dead broke, and the regulators should have intervened.

The Federal regulators are doing their best imitation of potted plants. They sit on their hands, we pay them salaries, and they do nothing. The fact is, they should have put a cap on wholesale prices for electricity in California.

We have big traders and big economic interests that take an Mcf of natural gas, trade it from an unregulated market to a regulated market, and in 24 to 48 hours, the price of that same Mcf of natural gas will double, triple, or quadruple. Guess who gets hit right square in the jaw with that. The consumer.

The price of power in California was $7 billion 2 years ago. It is expected to be $70 billion this year, a tenfold increase.

My point is this: Whether it is the price of natural gas that is being sold into California or the price of natural gas that is doubling around the rest of the country, or the price of gasoline at the gas pump, or the price of electricity, the fact is, we need to shine the spotlight of investigation on energy pricing in this country.

The education bill is going to be pending in the Senate when we return. It has an amendment that is pending which I offered calling for a joint House-Senate investigative committee on energy pricing. Is there some manipulation going on? Are there some interests that are manipulating both price and supply and driving up energy prices for the American people? I do not know, but I suspect so.

Some very limited investigations have shown that supply has been manipulated in a way to drive up price. It seems to me, given what is happening in California and the rest of the west coast, and given what is happening to natural gas prices and other things around the country, and the price at the gas pump for that matter, the American people will be served well by shining a spotlight of investigation on energy pricing practices all across this country.

That would represent a component to an energy plan that gives the American people some confidence that we are doing the right thing.

Mr. DURBIN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DORGAN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. DURBIN. I thank the Senator from North Dakota for highlighting this energy issue. If there were ever a moment in time when we should talk about energy, it is on the Friday before the Memorial Day weekend when families across America are making plans to head out for vacations or family reunions. It is the time when they get in the car or decide whether to take a long or short trip and become sensitized to the price of gasoline.

In Chicago and in the Midwest, for the second year running, we have seen devastating increases in the price of gasoline. It seems Easter is the kickoff for the oil companies to start raising the prices and then to catch all sorts of criticism from the public and elected officials and to bring them down after Memorial Day. In the meantime, families and businesses are being socked by the high prices.

The Senator from North Dakota puts his finger on it. This Congress has been unwilling to take a look at the energy industry. Certainly, we do not expect the White House, with the President and Vice President, with their background in this field, to do it. If this Congress will not do it, the consumers of America stand on the sidelines. They stand on the sidelines with their pockets empty because each time they go to the gasoline station, they are putting more and more money into their cars and trucks, into their vehicles to move their families.

I ask the Senator from North Dakota, if we have an opportunity for a joint conference with the House and Senate in a bipartisan approach to get into the energy pricing, how soon can we have that hearing, what kind of things can we look into, what kind of relief can we offer to businesses and families across America who are being nailed by the high energy prices?

Mr. DORGAN. The Senator from Illinois knows we have an amendment pending on the Elementary and Secondary Education Act that calls for the creation of a select committee on investigation. One of the problems is you need resources to do that; you need investigators. You cannot do this without the ability to investigate pricing practices. My hope is that we can move quickly when we get back. We will have a vote and see who wants to do this.

I make another point that is important. One hundred years ago, Teddy Roosevelt, carrying a big stick, said to John D. Rockefeller: "You can't do that." He was talking about price fixing with respect to oil and energy. He began to break it up.

I am not alleging there is widespread fraud or abuse. All I am saying is there are things that do not add up. We have big energy traders, huge economic interests, trading energy and doing it at secret prices from unregulated markets into regulated markets. We have oil companies much, much bigger than they used to be because they merged, and merged, and merged again. We have economic power with the opportunity to manipulate markets and try to drive up prices. Who are the victims? The victims are the American consumers. They deserve to know.

There was a limited Federal Trade Commission investigation dealing with gas prices last year in the Midwest. Some say that exonerated the companies. It did no such thing. It was such a limited investigation. Even that limited investigation showed some deliberately limited refinery output. They did not want to increase supply because they knew if they restricted supply, they could jack up prices.

Mr. DURBIN. I ask the Senator another question. When we ask the people in the energy business, why are prices out of control, they say it is the market mechanism, market forces.

There are two things I find interesting. Our common experience says when gasoline prices go up in a town, they all go up at the same time in lockstep. When they come down, they trickle down at the same rate. You don't see competition in pricing that could be found in any other market.

Second, the oil companies consistently guess wrong about supply. That is what the Federal Trade Commission said. Why would they guess wrong? They make more money when they guess wrong. These oil companies are now having record profits and they are saying: We just did not have pipeline capacity; we were not prepared for reformulated gas, for clean air; we made a mistake.

Look at what resulted from the mistake. It did not result in their being penalized. It resulted in their being rewarded with some of the highest profits they have seen in 10 years. I cannot think of another company or another industry in America that can guess wrong so consistently and profit from it time and time again.

Vice President CHENEY recently he saw no evidence of price gouging. Mr. Vice President CHENEY, come to Chicago, come to Illinois. Take a look at what happened in a 30-day period. The price of gasoline went up 50 cents a gallon. No price gouging?

I have a quote from Vice President CHENEY who said:

Americans are more understanding and tolerant of high gas prices than most pundits believe.

Again, I invite the Vice President to speak not only to the families who are now paying $50 and $60 and $70 to fill the gas tank but also talk to business people, the small businesses that have been forced to consider layoffs and a reduction in their own activities because of high energy prices. To say people understand this and accept it is to ignore our responsibility. We are supposed to be there for these consumers and these businesses and these families who have no other voice in the process.

I have joined with the Senator from North Dakota. I think it is important we have this investigative hearing to make certain that the people who run this industry come in and are held accountable.

I also think when we get into the debate about energy, we ought to have consumers at the table. It is not enough to have the energy giants and the government agencies and people in pinstriped suits from K Street in Washington. Let's have people representing small businesses in Illinois, farm families from North Dakota, who can talk about the practical impact. I know the Senator from North Dakota supports that. I would appreciate it if he told me what he thinks we can do to deal with the market mechanism which always is stacked against the consumer.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, the market is broken. It is clearly broken.

Look at what is happening in California: $7 billion was the cost of power in California 2 years ago. This year it is estimated to be $70 billion, a tenfold increase. Who are the victims? The folks in California who are going to work every day, coming home to open the bills and figure out how to pay an electric bill that has dramatically increased.

That is why I say, look, we need a new energy plan. I don't disagree with that. We have not had a good energy plan for decades. We are too dependent on foreign sources.

The Senator from Idaho piqued my interest on the subject. There are a lot of areas we can agree. I agree with the Senator from Idaho, that we do need to produce more oil and gas. I agree with that. We need to build more power lines and more transmission capability. I agree with that. We need to build more powerplants, I agree. We need to use more coal sources, use more clean coal technology, and do all of that while being sensitive to the needs of the environment. We can do that. I support that in a manner consistent with protecting our environment.

Then I say: Support us on this. We need better conservation. More conservation. We need more effort towards renewable sources of energy. We need more effort towards greater efficiency of appliances and the rules that support that are in place. And now the administration threatens to retract on some of those rules.

Finally, we also need to have an investigation of pricing practices. Join us on that.

If my colleague from Idaho and his colleagues would join in the resolution I have included on the Elementary and Secondary Education Act that calls for the selection of a House and Senate committee to investigate pricing, we will have an energy plan that includes a lot of the right things but also says, while we are doing this, let's take a look to make sure the American people are not victims of pricing practices and supply manipulation that enriches some of the bigger economic interests, but takes it out of the pockets of the folks who are trying to gas up at the pump in order to go to work.

Mr. DURBIN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DORGAN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. DURBIN. I follow up on a point. There was an old saying during debate of the Clean Air Act, a belief that once we established standards for clean air in America, it was said as a result of that Government decision, the people in the automobile industry in Japan went out and hired an army of engineers to figure out how to make their cars cleaner and more fuel efficient.

The people in charge of the American automobile industry went out and hired an army of lawyers to fight the regulations at every possible level. That is an oversimplification.

But I want to say to the Senator from North Dakota that 8 years ago, during the Clinton-Gore administration they said to Detroit: We want you to sit down and work on a more fuel-efficient automobile that is safe for families. We are prepared to make certain that you do not run afoul of any anti-trust violations. We want you to come together, the big three, put your heads together with your best creative talent and come up with that automobile, come up with that SUV, come up with that truck. They gave them that assignment. They moved forward with it and they hoped for the best.

Let's take a look at where we are today. Today the only vehicle I know of that is on the road that offers fuel economy over 50 miles a gallon in a car that is of normal size is, sadly, from Toyota Motor Company. It is a model called the Prius. They have a 5-month waiting list of people who want to buy this car which combines electric power with a gas engine and gives much greater fuel economy.

Detroit announced last week that they will have a competitor for the Toyota Prius in about 3 or 4 years.

You have to ask yourself, what is going on here? If this country, with all its creative talent and technological skill, cannot come up with a product, an automobile, a truck, an SUV, that is safe and fuel efficient, what are we missing?

I think what we are missing is the guidance and leadership and direction from the top. We cannot just say let market forces come to work because if market forces come to work, we are going to get scooped time and time again by someone with more vision. Sadly, in this case it happens to be a foreign automobile manufacturer.

I ask the Senator from North Dakota if part of this energy debate should not include incentives for those who are making the automobiles and the trucks and other vehicles to come up with more fuel-efficient vehicles so we can have safe vehicles that also reduce our need for foreign oil.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, I say to the Senator from Illinois, I think that makes a great deal of sense. I know one of our colleagues drives one of the hybrid cars. I have seen it parked outside of the building when we have late votes. It is a car that runs on both gasoline and electricity. I understand they are very efficient.

But the roads are not populated with many of those cars, largely because we have an energy industry and auto industry that moves down the road with the internal combustion engine, and they fight every step of the way on increased efficiencies people propose in Congress.

Mr. President, I have told my colleagues this before, my first car was a 1924 Model T Ford. I bought an antique car and restored it. My dad told me where it was. He was hauling gasoline and was out on a farm and they had an old car in a granary. He told me about it and said you should write to this fellow and see if he wants to sell it. The guy had long since moved to Wisconsin. So I wrote to this fellow from Wisconsin and asked if he wanted to sell an old Model T stored in a granary for 30 or 40 years. I was a teenager.

He said he would sell it for me for $25, and he sent me the owner's manual and the key. So I went out and hauled the old Model T in and restored it.

It is interesting, that 1924 Model T Ford is fueled exactly the way a car built in 2001 is fueled. You pull up to a gas pump and you stick the nozzle in the tank and you pump gas in it. Think of the few things that have changed in 75 or 80 or 90 years—almost everything has changed around us. Almost everything we do is dazzling, breathtaking new technology, technological change that takes your breath away. Guess what. Eighty years ago you pulled up to a pump and stuck a hose in and pumped a little gas in, and 80 years later you do exactly the same thing.

You wonder why; why would nothing change? Clearly, part of the solution is technology. I just described the technology of a car that is occasionally parked in front of the Capitol. We have the capability of making more efficient automobiles. Of course we have the capability. We ought to have the will. As the Senator from Illinois says and proposes, we ought to provide incentives as part of an energy plan to say to those who are interested in doing that: Here is your head, go do it. We encourage you to do it. Here are the financial incentives to do it.

That is another way to provide conservation and new technology to move out of this energy problem that we have. That is longer term, not short term. But it is certainly part of what we ought to be doing.

Mr. DURBIN. If the Senator will yield, I would like to ask him this question. There are those who argue from the energy industry side that the only way we can improve our energy future in America is by compromising on air quality standards. They suggest it is environmental regulation which is causing the problem we face today.

I disagree with that. I think they ignore realities. One of the realities we should not ignore is to perhaps visit a local hospital, go to an emergency room, and ask the doctor who is in control what is the No. 1 diagnosis of children going to emergency rooms in America today. I was surprised to learn it is not trauma, kids falling off a bicycle; it is asthma. The No. 1 reason kids miss school: Asthma. The No. 1 diagnosis in emergency rooms: Asthma. Pulmonary disease, lung problems, and asthma are, unfortunately, becoming epidemic in our country. I cannot give you the specific reason for all of it, but the people I have spoken to say air quality is part of it.

I will mention something else to the Senator from North Dakota. The former head of the Environmental Protection Agency, Carol Browner, told me that the Web site for the Environmental Protection Agency had a dramatic increase in visits from a few thousand a month to millions a month when they started posting ozone alerts on cities across America. Families literally got up in the morning and logged on, went to the EPA Web site to find out whether it was safe for their child to go outside. Think about that.

If we are talking about compromising air quality standards in America, more kids are going to be sitting inside their homes; more elderly people with pulmonary disease are going to be at risk. We cannot afford that. We can have a good energy policy and not compromise the public health of this Nation and the health of families across the board. I totally reject the concept that I have heard from some in this administration and from the energy industry that the only way we can move forward in America is at the expense of our health.

This should not be "your money or your life." In this situation I think we can have a good energy policy that does not compromise that basic quality standard. We have made amazing progress over the last 20 years. Visit any foreign industrialized country and take a look at the muck they call air. Go to Beijing in China. You wake up in the morning and say it is a foggy day; at noon you say it is still a foggy day; midafternoon, still a foggy day; at night, still foggy; and the next morning, the same. Every day, day after day, the air quality is miserable.

I don't pick on China. There are many other comparable countries. The United States should lead, not only being an industrial power but also sensitive to the health of its people. I ask the Senator from North Dakota for his comments on this relationship between energy and the environment.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois makes a good point. Increasing the supply of energy in this country does not have to be at odds with protecting and preserving a good environment. It just does not.

We have had experience with this in North Dakota. Some 25 years ago, the proposals to build coal-fired electric generating plants in our State produced a great deal of controversy. I was one in the State capital who led the fight saying if we are going to build coal-fired generating plants, then you must provide the latest available technology on those stacks. We must have wet scrubbers and the latest available technology to scrub down those emissions.

The industry was furious with me because I led a vigorous fight and we built those plants in North Dakota. But they did it and they had to have latest available technology scrubbers on their stacks. When they strip-mined to get the coal, they had to segregate top soil and do layers and topography restoration. They did not like it. But guess what. We did it the right way.

Mr. President, 25 years later, looking in the rear-view mirror, they would all agree that was the right thing to do. We were the first State in the Union to meet the ambient air quality standards. We now have segregated top soil and topography restored on strip-mined lands of which we are proud.

You can do this the right way. I know the energy industry sometimes doesn't want to because it is more costly to do it that way. But it makes sense to do it the right way. Increasing the supply of energy does not have to be at odds with protecting our environment.

Let me make one final important point. Gregg Easterbrooke wrote a book that I believe was entitled "America the OK." It was published a few years ago. In it he said we have doubled our use of energy in our country in the last 20 years, and we have cleaner air and cleaner water. Why? Because this country demanded it. We demanded, through the Clean Air and Clean Water Acts, that we take steps to protect our air and our water.

The point is, no one 20 years ago would have predicted you could double the use of energy without significantly fouling your air and water. If you do it the right way, you can coexist: an increased energy supply with a good, clean environment. That is what the Senator from Illinois is saying.

So as we go through these battles about energy policy, my hope is that the good ideas on that side of the aisle can be merged with our good ideas and we can have a policy that is balanced. Yes, more production, but production the right way, with environmental safeguards. Yes, let's also insist on some conservation, efficiency, and renewable energy at the same time; we can do all of this together.

But it is not a balanced energy plan simply to say, the market will take care of this. The market is broken, and we know it. Buy electricity in California today, and ask yourself whether you think this market works, while the big economic interests get rich and you get gouged. Ask yourself then, on the west coast: Do you think this market works? Everyone in the country knows that is not the case.

Americans deserve the opportunity to have an investigation of energy pricing that shines a spotlight on pricing and supplies and evaluates whether they are being manipulated in a way that victimizes consumers.

As I said before, 100 years ago, Teddy Roosevelt took a big stick and said to John D. Rockefeller, you cannot do this any more, because he was manipulating the price of oil. And 100 years later it is useful for us to have a significant investigation of both the price and supply of energy and find out who is doing what so the American people have some confidence, as we develop a new energy plan, that the big economic interests will not gouge the American consumers.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBERTS). The distinguished Senator from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. CLELAND. Thank you very much.

Mr. President, I appreciate the magnificent discussion on energy policy and environmental concerns led by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from Illinois.

I would like to change the subject for a moment as we approach Memorial Day weekend.

MEMORIAL DAY

Mr. CLELAND. Mr. President, on next Monday, May 28, and acting pursuant to a joint resolution actually approved by the Congress back in 1950, the President of the United States will issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe a day of prayer for permanent peace in remembrance of all of those brave Americans who have died in our Nation's service.

In many ways, this is part of our history and heritage, Memorial Day. In 1866, citizens from both the North and the South, after the Civil War, decided to form the first Memorial Day effort and place a flag on the grave sites of those brave Americans who had died in the Civil War.

That is actually how Memorial Day got started.

Whenever Memorial Day comes around, I am reminded of what may well have been the first, and is still one of the finest, memorials to fallen soldiers. Thousands of years ago: the Funeral Oration of the great Athenian leader Pericles, as recorded by the historian Thucydides, during the Peloponnesian War in the 5th century BC:

For this offering of their lives made in common by them all they each of them individually received that renown which never grows old, and for a sepulcher, not so much that in which their bones have been deposited, but that noblest of shrines wherein their glory is laid up to be eternally remembered upon every occasion on which deed or story shall call for its commemoration. For heroes have the whole earth for their tomb; and in lands far from their own, where the column with its epitaph declares it, there is enshrined in every breast a record unwritten with no tablet to preserve it, except that of the heart.

There are many thoughts as we approach Memorial Day weekend. In that spirit, I am pleased that both the House and the Senate have now passed legislation that will expedite a monument commemorating the sacrifice of those who served in World War II.

My father served in World War II after the attack at Pearl Harbor. This weekend I will be visiting some of my fellow veterans, and we will see the premiere of the new movie "Pearl Harbor."

I introduced a resolution on Tuesday calling upon all Americans to especially dedicate Memorial Day of 2001 to those brave American men and women who have given their lives in service to their country especially since the end of the war in Viet Nam.

As a Vietnam veteran, I appreciate the monument in this great city, sometimes called "The Wall," the Vietnam Veterans Memorial.

But no grand edifices or other public monuments commemorate the deeds of those who have died after the Vietnam war, but their service to their country was just as strong, their sacrifice just as great, their families' and communities' loss just as keen as that of their predecessors in the two world wars of the 20th century, Korea and Viet Nam.

Honoring our fallen heroes is altogether fitting and proper, as President Lincoln said at Gettysburg. At this point, I thank my many colleagues, on both sides of the aisle, who joined me in cosponsoring this resolution: Senators MCCAIN, LEVIN, HUTCHISON, MILLER, BIDEN, JEFFORDS, LANDRIEU, BENNETT, MURRAY, JOHNSON, CARNAHAN, DAYTON, CONRAD, KENNEDY, DURBIN, HATCH, SESSIONS, CLINTON, and ALLEN. I also thank the entire Senate for adopting this measure by unanimous consent last evening.

I am reminded of the line from one of Wellington's troops that: "In time of war, and not before, God and the soldier men adore. And in time of peace, with all things righted, God is forgotten and the soldier slighted."

Mr. President, I am honored to live in a country that forgets not God and does not slight the soldier.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The distinguished Senator from Missouri is recognized.

EXTENSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, on behalf of the leader, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate remain in a period of morning business with Senators speaking for up to 10 minutes each, with the following exceptions: Senator DURBIN or his designee will control the floor from 11 to noon and from 1 to 2 p.m.—and I ask within that timeframe, if no one seeks the floor, I may be recognized to introduce a bill—and Senator THOMAS or his designee will control the floor from noon to 1 p.m. and from 2 to 3 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to speak as in morning business for up to 10 minutes for the purpose of introducing legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The remarks of Mr. BOND pertaining to the introduction of S. 967 are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

Mr. BOND. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The distinguished Senator from North Dakota is recognized.

RURAL AMERICA

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, some weeks ago, I was on an airplane, and I had a laptop computer with me and my briefcase. Like most of my colleagues sitting on an airplane, I went through my briefcase and found a letter from the U.S. Park Service. I read the letter, and it provoked me to get my laptop computer out of its case and put it on the tray table, and I started typing.

I created a message for the U.S. Park Service. Here is what their letter said to me. The U.S. Park Service wrote me a letter and said in the Teddy Roosevelt National Park, one of their picnic grounds was being colonized by prairie dogs. So they were going to do something called a "scoping" exercise and an EA, called an environmental assessment, to think about spending a quarter of a million dollars to move the picnic grounds.

I read and reread this Park Service letter about the scoping and the environmental assessment they were doing to spend a quarter of a million dollars to move the picnic grounds, and I sent them a letter.

What I said to the Park Service was that I found it interesting that they had the time to do scoping and EAs on these kinds of issues. I said, at the moment, we are in a rather complicated budget fight in Congress, but you have solicited my opinion, so let me give you a few thoughts.

I said: I am not unsympathetic to prairie dogs. I think they are cute little creatures. They, unlike the rats, were blessed with a furry tail and a button nose and they have a good deal more human sympathy, therefore, than rats do.

I asked the Park Service what would have been the Park Service's response if it had been a group of rats that had colonized the picnic area rather than prairie dogs. Then I thought better of asking because maybe they would have had a larger EA and scoping mission.

My point to them was: Do not waste the taxpayers' money; do not move the picnic grounds, move the prairie dogs.

I said: When I was growing up, about 50 miles from where they have this problem in the Badlands, I was growing up in Regent, ND, we had a group of rats "colonize," to use the Park Service's word, our horse barn. I was about 14 at the time, and my dad said the rats could live a very good life just 1 mile from our barn in the town dumps, which is where a lot of rats live, and he said he would like me to enlist a couple of my schoolmates and see if we couldn't move the rats.

It turns out these rats were no match for three 14-year-old boys. We very quickly retook the Dorgan horse barn. We understood that we could do that without a lot of effort.

Getting back to the prairie dogs, I told the Park Service that I figure there are about 1.4 million acres of ground in the Badlands in North Dakota in which prairie dogs can, do, and are colonizing. They have many prairie dogs in the Badlands. So the prairie dogs can colonize in a million and a half acres or so. They just cannot colonize in this picnic area.

I said: The way to handle these prairie dogs is to find somebody who can communicate with them. That is not hard. We have a lot of folks who ranch and farm and spend a lot of time around animals, and one very quickly learns how to communicate with animals. I raised some horses. We raised cattle, and we learned how to communicate with animals.

I said to the Park Service: If you do not have anybody who knows how to communicate with an animal, go out in a ranching area and get some instruction, and once they have taught you how to send certain communications to animals, go back and have a little discussion with those prairie dogs and tell the prairie dogs they are not welcome in the picnic area; that you do not want to spend a quarter of a million dollars of the taxpayers' money to move the picnic area, and you want them to leave. And if they will not leave, I said to the Park Service, here is a cost-free way to deal with it: Get about three 14-year-old boys from somewhere in that area, and they will take care of that problem real quick for you.

As I was sitting on this airplane thinking about all the things we confront in rural America—yes in and near the Badlands where I grew up—I was thinking that we are not short of prairie dogs; we are short of people. We have Federal agencies that want to treat lightly that which is serious and then treat seriously that which is light, and they do not quite understand.

The real problem in our part of the country, where the Park Service is worried about prairie dogs and picnic areas, is that human beings are becoming an endangered species. All of our rural counties are shrinking like prunes. The counties are shrinking in population. People are leaving, not coming in. Farmers and ranchers are leaving the land at an alarming rate. Small towns are shrinking. Many rural counties are very fast becoming a wilderness area. That is not by Federal designation, it is the way things are working in rural America.

I said to the Park Service: When I received your letter about prairie dogs, picnic areas, and environmental assessments, and scoping, it just seemed to be such an unusual bureaucratic effort for such a minor issue.

Having prairie dogs move into a picnic area, in my judgment, does not rank up there with having people moving out of rural America. So I said: You have to excuse me for being a little impatient.

Just once, I told the Park Service, I would like to see a Federal agency crank up a little energy, a little emotion about the real problems facing rural America.

Have my colleagues ever heard of a Federal agency say: This county has shrunk 50 percent; we are going to do a scoping exercise to figure out what we can do to solve that problem.

Have my colleagues ever heard of a Federal agency cranking up an effort to do an environmental assessment of what is happening with the creation of wilderness areas, where people are moving out, jobs are leaving, and people on Main Street are having a devil of a time keeping their front door open because rural areas are shrinking?

Have my colleagues heard a Federal agency say that matters to them; they are going to make an effort to find out about that?

No; oh no. Scoping and environmental assessments are reserved for dealing with furry little creatures that inhabit a picnic area. God forbid a Federal agency ought to spend its money and its time worrying about a few prairie dogs.

Again, we are just not short of prairie dogs, we are short of people in rural America. I would like very much just once to have a Federal agency, the Park Service, the Forest Service—you pick it—just once to have a Federal agency get aggressive on something that really matters to us in rural America.

I said to the Park Service: You probably regret asking for my advice. You probably certainly regret I had time on an airplane to read your letter and had a laptop available to respond to it. But, frankly, my advice is do not spend the taxpayers' money, do not spend a quarter of a million dollars; get those prairie dogs out of the picnic area and get your people, if you have the time work on things that really matter, to work on things with us that matter to rural America in a real way.

I know the Park Service has read my letter because they sent me another letter and said this is not just about prairie dogs and picnic areas, it is now about the bubonic plague or some god-awful thing, and they have developed several areas of new dimensions to this tiny little issue, as is always the case. I am sure they brought in four or five specialists now to respond to this issue that I have raised with them about worrying about all the wrong things.

Some days you just scratch your head and wonder whether bureaucracy has any common sense left.

I say to the Park Service, and all the others who are engaged in these Federal agencies: Give us some help from time to time on things that really matter to people living in rural America.

I live in a wonderful State. It provides a wonderful environment for people who want to live in an area where they have good neighbors, no overcrowding, and very little crime. It is a wonderful place with wonderful values. The fact is, we are fighting a losing battle in many ways trying to keep people, jobs, promote economic opportunity and a future that has some assistance for people who want to live in rural areas.

I say to Federal agencies: If you want to worry about something, do not worry about a few prairie dogs in a picnic area. Help us worry about promoting some economic help in rural America for a change.

If you don't want to do that, cut some of the positions out of some of the agencies to say you have too many people working on some of the issues. Maybe we can cut down on the idle time.

It was therapeutic for me to say this on the floor. It probably was a slow water drip for the Presiding Officer. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the letter I sent to the Park Service on the subject of prairie dogs and picnic areas and scoping and environmental impacts, and I say to them, save your breath and save the taxpayers' money and work on things for a change that do matter.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MOVE THE PRAIRIE DOGS

(By U.S. Senator Byron Dorgan, D-North Dakota)

The National Park Service wants to spend nearly a quarter of a million of dollars to move a picnic area in Theodore Roosevelt National Park to accommodate a colony of prairie dogs that moved into the area. A quarter of a million dollars? To move a picnic area? To accommodate prairie dogs?

They must be kidding, right? No. They're serious.

Following is the text of a letter I'm sending to the acting Director of the National Park Service in Washington, D.C.:

DEAR MR. GALVIN: This is in response to the Park Service letter asking for my thoughts about how to deal with some prairie dogs that have "colonized" your picnic area in the south unit of the Badlands in North Dakota.

Your letter stated that you are "scoping" the issues and about to prepare an "Environmental Assessment" (EA) to determine whether you should spend $223,000 to reconstruct the picnic area in a different location.

We're in the middle of a rather complicated fight about the federal budget here in Congress, but still, I'm pleased to offer a few thoughts about prairie dogs and picnic areas.

Now I want you to know that I'm not unsympathetic to prairie dogs. They are cute little creatures. Unlike a rat, the prairie dog was blessed with a furry tail and button nose and seems to have a better public image. But, I just wonder if it had been rats that had colonized the picnic grounds if you would be talking about spending a small fortune to fix the problem? Maybe I shouldn't ask. . . .

My advice is this: don't waste the taxpayers' money. You don't have to move the picnic grounds. Move the prairie dogs!

When I was growing up in Regent, some rats "colonized" (to use your term) our horse barn. My dad told me that since it was our barn, and the rats could live a good life just a mile south in the town dump, I should get rid of them. I recruited a few school friends to help. We didn't do any "scoping" or "Environmental Assessment." The rats were in a foul mood, but they were no match for three fourteen year old boys. We reclaimed the Dorgan barn in no time.

Now getting back to the prairie dogs that are "colonizing" your picnic area, I figure that there are about 1,428,288 acres of ground in the Badlands that those little dogs can colonize. But they have no right to do it in your picnic area.

So here's what you should do. And it's nearly cost free. Find a way to communicate with those prairie dogs. If you don't know how, check with some of the neighbors living in western North Dakota. When you live on a farm or ranch, you learn quickly how to communicate with animals.

Once your Park Service employees get the hang of communicating with prairie dogs, have them let those dogs know you're reclaiming your picnic area, with force if necessary. And if those prairie dogs won't leave, you go out and hire three or four teenagers from the area and tell them to get the job done. I guarantee you those kids will have this problem solved in just a couple of days. And it don't cost you $223,000.

Don't misunderstand me. I am a supporter of our environment, of wildlife and, yes, of the Endangered Species Act. And so are most North Dakotans. But prairie dogs are not endangered in western North Dakota. To those who insist they are, I challenge them to put a male prairie dog and a female prairie dog in their own backyard and report back to us in a couple of years.

The fact is, we're not short of prairie dogs. We're running short of people!

The real endangered species, especially in the western part of our state, is the human species.

Farmers and ranchers are leaving the land at an alarming rate. Small towns are shrinking like prunes. Many rural counties are fast becoming wilderness areas.

When I received your letter about prairie dogs, picnic areas and environmental impact statements, it seemed such an unusual response to such a small issue.

Having prairie dogs move into a picnic area doesn't rank up there with the problem of people moving out of our state.

You'll have to excuse me for being impatient with federal agencies that treat the light too seriously and the serious too lightly.

Just once I would like to hear of a federal agency interested in doing an impact statement on what our country will lose when there are no family farms or ranches left in rural America. How about "scoping" that issue? Or how about an impact statement on the damage done to our farmers and ranchers from the mergers and monopolies that are being formed in the industries that farmers rely on such as the railroads, grain trade, packing plants and more.

By now you probably regret asking for my advice. Simply put, my advice is don't you dare spend nearly a quarter of a million dollars to move that picnic ground. Move the prairie dogs.

And then spend some time with me and others in Congress to help create a friendly environment for people to make a decent living on our farms and ranches in rural America.

Sincerely,

BYRON L. DORGAN,
U.S. Senator.

Mr. DORGAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. INHOFE). The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mrs. HUTCHISON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHAFEE) ordered.

THIS GREAT DEMOCRACY

Mrs. HUTCHISON. Mr. President, this has been a tumultuous week in the Senate. We have had significant legislative accomplishments. I think it is an interesting process to watch the changes that are taking place. It always makes me value our Constitution and the peaceful transitions of power our Constitution has provided.

I was watching C-SPAN this morning. The topic was "The Greatest Generation." People were talking about what they consider to be our greatest generation. The debate was about whether the greatest generation was the wonderful heroes who went to battle in World War I and especially World War II, because we are talking to them, and in Tom Brokaw's book "The Greatest Generation" being the silent heroes, the people who answered the call of their country and fought bravely and came home and never talked about it, never whined, never complained. They are, indeed, our great heroes.

Then people started talking about the greatest generation being our Founding Fathers and their families, and the sacrifices they made when they declared independence and when they crafted our Constitution that set in place the document that has kept us vibrant and alive today.

Through all of the things that I, personally, have lived, even in my mere 7 years in the Senate, I have seen our Constitution tested and prevail, tested and come through, tested and show the wisdom of the balance our Founding Fathers put in place so we could have changes in power and have them peacefully.

While talking about the greatest generation, it also has come home to me when I have visited foreign countries, foreign countries that have seen the despotism of military rule, of dictatorships, of communism. They are coming out of those totalitarian governments. They are coming into democracy. I thank the Lord, I thank my lucky stars, and I feel so grateful we had Founding Fathers, and families who supported our Founding Fathers, who created a document that is living today, that has given the balance so we have never had a totalitarian government since the democracy we formed in 1776.

I feel very proud, and it came home to me today as I started thinking about the greatest generation. I think our Founding Fathers and their families certainly created generations behind them who also were great in that they answered the call of the time. That is what has happened throughout the 17 or so generations since the founding of our country. Sometimes we have not had to answer a crisis. Sometimes the United States has had a period of peace and prosperity. When we have been tested throughout the 17 or 18 generations, we have met the test. We have met the test because we have learned from our Founding Fathers and their families and we have built on their strengths and the Constitution they created. We have been able to answer every test with success.

I feel very grateful to live in a society where we can debate which were the greatest generations. I don't think we have had a generation that has ever sunk to the lows we have seen in other countries and other societies where our Government has broken apart or our institutions have broken apart. I think we have perhaps expanded beyond the boundaries, but we have always come back because we have the structure that we do.

I appreciate very much the opportunity to serve in the Senate in this great democracy and hope we will always be able to meet the test of the strength of our Founding Fathers and always be grateful for the Constitution that has been so vibrant throughout the generations.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. INHOFE). The Senator from Maine.

Ms. COLLINS. I thank the Chair.

(The remarks of Ms. COLLINS pertaining to the introduction of S. 970 are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

Ms. COLLINS. Mr. President, I yield the floor and, seeing no one seeking recognition, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Ms. COLLINS). Without objection, it is so ordered.

TAX RELIEF FOR THE AMERICAN PEOPLE

Mr. INHOFE. Madam President, while I was presiding, something occurred to me. I felt compelled to share it.

Right now, something very significant is taking place. There is a conference committee that is looking at the bill that we passed and the bill that was passed in the House of Representatives. They are going to come out with a product and decide just how to change it because the bills are not exactly the same.

It is a piece of legislation that will do something very significant. It is going to provide tax relief for the American people. It occurred to me—I will use the words "liberal" and "conservative" in a very friendly way, but all too often, people do not know what you are talking about when you call someone a liberal or a moderate or a conservative.

A liberal believes that Government should have a greater involvement in his or her life and really believes that there are more things in which the Government should be involved. I suggest to you that the more things Government gets involved in, the more individual freedoms we lose.

I happen to be a conservative. I agree that Government is involved in too many things. I think that other than national defense, which we need to be more involved in right now, there are many activities taking place in this country that our Founding Fathers really did not think were the role of the Federal Government.

We are in a very strange time right now. We are in a time when we have surpluses. We are all very gratified for that. But the whole idea of tax relief is offensive to people who fall into the definition I just referred to of a liberal. They want to use that money. They want to start new programs.

Now we have this time of surplus. I want to applaud the President of the United States, George W. Bush, because what he said he wanted to do was, first of all, take everything that could be used to spend down the deficit for the next 10 years and use it.

I have a lot of town meetings in my State of Oklahoma with very wise people, but they are too busy going out to make a living and paying for all this fun we are having in Washington, that they do not really understand that when you have such surpluses that once you use those surpluses to start new Government programs, then the Government programs might work, and the problems that they are addressing might go away but the Government program goes on.

I can remember that one of the greatest speeches made during my career was one that was made many years ago by Ronald Reagan before he even ran for Governor of California. The speech was called "Rendezvous With Destiny." He said: There's nothing closer to immortality on the face of this Earth than a Government agency, once formed.

So if you don't want to increase the size and scope of Government, then you need to address what the President is addressing now. President Bush said: Let's start off by taking all the money to pay down the debt. Most people think, if you had $5 billion, you go up there and drop it someplace and the debt would be gone. That is not true because you can't pay off something until it comes due. So what this President has suggested to us is, let's pay off everything for the next 10 years that can be paid off on the national debt.

Then let's look at Social Security. Let's make sure the fund is actuarially sound and the money is going to be there for the people when they reach the age that they can draw it out.

Incidentally, Social Security reform doesn't mean that is going to change. That program would continue; the money will be there; but it will give some of the new people who come into the program an option as to what they do with the money they pay into the system.

Then the President said: Let's take Medicare and do the same thing with that. So he proposed actually increasing it by $153 billion over a period of 6 years—that would take care of that problem—and after that, to put some money in so we can take care of a very serious problem, the most serious problem the Nation is facing right now, and that is the demise of the military over the last 8 years. Let's build that back up.

After that has been done, all of that is behind us, then let's take this surplus that remains and return it to the American people as an overpayment because they paid too much. It is like buying a car and you find out when you get back home, you read the sticker price and think, wait a minute, I paid too much. You go back to the dealer and you expect to get the money back. He would say: I gave it to my mother-in-law. That is kind of what happens in this case.

So we have the opportunity to return to those who paid it an amount of money. We should be looking at a much larger tax reduction than they are negotiating right now. What they are negotiating right now, if you put it in as a percentage of GDP, would be about 1 percent. Yet our other two major reductions in this century were far greater than that.

The liberals are missing a bet. If they really want to get more money into the system, they should be supporting larger tax cuts because history has shown us, when you reduce the marginal rates, it has the effect of increasing revenues.

Going back to World War I, the President, after World War I, said: The war effort is behind us now so we will go ahead and reduce these marginal income tax rates. And they did. To their shock, they found out that it didn't reduce revenues. It massively increased revenues.

I am a conservative Republican. I look back wistfully at the days when we had a President, a Democrat, who realized that this concept works every time. It was President Kennedy in the 1960s who said, we need to expand the role of Government and get into a lot of programs—perhaps such as the dental program the Presiding Officer discussed—and the best way to do this—this is a direct quote from President Kennedy—to increase revenues, is "to reduce the marginal rates so that the economy will expand." For each 1-percent expansion in the economy, that produces about $46 billion in new revenue.

Sure enough, it happened. In fact, it almost doubled the revenue in the 6 years after that massive cut. Remember how big that cut was? It went from 91 percent down to 78 percent. It was a huge cut, much greater than we are talking about doing today. So that worked and some of these programs were funded.

Then along came Ronald Reagan. The decade of the 1980s, from 1980 to 1990, saw the largest tax reduction in the history of this Nation. President Reagan was elected and the first thing he did was sign the tax reduction. He took that 78-percent rate and brought it all the way down to, I think, 28 percent. The result was great increases, massive increases in revenues.

To document that, the total amount of revenue that came in from all marginal rates in 1980 was $244 billion. In 1990, it was $466 billion after all the reductions that had taken place, the largest reductions in any 10-year period in the Nation's history.

You hear the liberals saying: Look at all the deficits that came about during that 10-year period. That wasn't a result of the President. That was a result of a very liberal, big-spending, Democrat-controlled House and Senate that increased the spending.

You cannot blame that on the President because he was the one who reduced the taxes and was responsible for doubling the revenues at that time.

We should stand back and look at this. We had one of the financial advisers to President Clinton, when he was President when he first came in, who made the statement that there was no relationship between the level of taxes the Nation pays and its productivity. Theoretically, that means if you pay 100-percent taxes, you will be just as motivated to work hard and to expand the economy as if you were paying no taxes. Obviously, that doesn't make sense.

It is time the American people realize what we are trying to do and what this President is trying to do and that we get the best conference report out and that this can be a very historic time because sometime, maybe today, that conference report will come out. It will incorporate some tax reduction, not great tax reduction—the top rate may be going down from 39 to 35 percent—and actually eliminating some taxes down at the lower income level. I think we have an opportunity to pass this thing out today. This will go down as probably a great legacy, not just for the President of the United States but for the House and the Senate which are working on this.

I yield the floor and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mrs. HUTCHISON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. INHOFE). Without objection, it is so ordered.

A MOMENTOUS WEEK

Mrs. HUTCHISON. Mr. President, I rise today to talk about some of the activities that are going on right now. We have had a momentous week in the Senate. We passed a tax relief bill so that every working American would get relief from the burden of taxation. We passed a budget that is responsible stewardship of the people's money.

I stress people's money because one of the things I think is very important is that we remember the money people work so hard to earn is not the Government's money. It is what people send to the Government to do the functions of Government and that we have the responsibility to assure it is wisely spent and what isn't necessary for the functions of Government is sent back to the people who earn the money. We believe that people can choose how to spend their money better than a big Government program can do.

So we have passed the budget resolution that provides for tax relief for hard-working Americans. It would be $1.35 trillion over a 10-year period. It would pay down the debt to the maximum extent possible without paying a premium for early payment of outstanding Treasury issues. And I think that is a very important component because paying down the debt frees up more money that is going to go to interest payments, and that is money that can either go into the spending that is necessary to cover the costs of Government or more can be sent back to the people who earn the money.

We also do provide in the budget that was passed at least a $500 billion cushion—a rainy day fund—which we think is very important for meeting the emergencies we might face in the next 10 years. It is also important for the added spending that we know we are going to face. We have set a 5-percent limit on the increase in spending for the next year. A 5-percent increase is more than most families are going to increase their spending in the next year, so I certainly think it is the most we should go beyond this year's spending of the Government money.

With that 5-percent increase and the $500 billion rainy day fund, we will be able to spend more in the priority areas such as national defense. We know we have fallen behind in the last few years in keeping up our strong national defense. We also know we are going to have to meet some future technology tests in order to maintain our superiority and security. So that means we are going to be looking at the next generation of airplane, the next generation of ship, the next generation of land-based vehicle, and the next generation of missile defense.

We must perfect our theater missile defense, so that when our troops are in any theater in the world, they will have the protection of a missile defense system, such as the PAC 3, which is a hit-to-kill missile—a missile that can hit a missile. That has been tested and it works. It is going to be the most successful theater defense system we have ever had in our country.

We are also looking at a longer range missile defense system, possibly a sea-based system and, later down the road, an intercontinental ballistic missile defense system. This is because we want to make sure that our shores are totally secure from any kind of incoming ballistic missile and that our people, wherever they may be in the world defending our interests, will also be secure. So that is going to take more money and we are going to put more money into it.

In addition to more defense spending, we are going to have to deal with prescription drug options in Medicare and prescription drug benefits for people who are facing true hardships in meeting their medical needs. That will take more money. I hope we can reform the Medicare system so that it does meet the test that all of us want it to meet for quality health care for our senior citizens, and that we can add a prescription drug component. So that will be another area of added spending.

I hope we will be able to have a Social Security reform bill, and all of the money that is now in Social Security surplus will be held for Social Security reform. It will be held for the integrity of the Social Security System that is done in the budget we have passed because we want to reform Social Security to make sure it is secure, not only today and 10 years from now but in the year 2030 when it will go into deficit if we don't do something to make sure it remains solid.

So we passed a very good budget. In that budget, we also allocated $1.35 trillion for tax relief. I am very proud that our conferees are trying to work that out between the two Houses. The two Houses passed very different bills. The Senate bill was passed this week; the House bill was passed earlier. They are different bills. The rate reduction is different in the two bills, so we are trying to reconcile those rate reductions. We are trying to make some of the reductions earlier in the process, over a 10-year period. Some of the rate reductions take effect later in the 10-year period. We would like to bring all of the reduction into 2002 so that every working American would start feeling some relief by January 1 of this year.

We are trying to give relief from the marriage penalty. When two single people are working—for instance, a policeman and a schoolteacher—when they get married today, they will pay approximately $1,400 more in taxes just because they got married. You may say, why would they have to pay $1,400 more in taxes? Why would our Tax Code do that? Well, it is because when they get married, they go into the next bracket; whereas, if they make $30,000 and $25,000, respectively, and they are in the 15-percent bracket, when they get married they go into the 28-percent bracket. That is a $1,400 hit. So we are going to try to relieve that penalty.

In the Senate bill, there was very solid relief—double the standard deduction, double the 15-percent bracket. That is solid relief. It will take place over the 10-year period. Many of us hoped it would take place sooner than the 10-year period, but at least if we can get that relief on the books, we will begin to change our Tax Code so that it does not discriminate against people who get married. We want people not to think of taxes as a factor when they decide to tie the knot and start their family.

So anything in the Tax Code that will have the effect of cutting back on the ability of people to get married and start their families, buy their first home, buy the extra car, whatever it is, we want them to be able to do it without regard to the Tax Code.

So we are looking at significant rate reductions that will affect every working American. We are talking about significant marriage penalty relief. We are also talking about relief from the death tax. We are talking about trying to keep a family-owned farm or business in the family.

I don't want to continue to see family businesses in our country sold to big businesses and take away the family nature of the business which is important to that family and important to every employee of that family business. I want those family businesses to stay together. I don't want every farm in America to be part of an international conglomerate. I want family farms to make it in America, and I want family ranches and family small businesses. That is the economic engine of this country, and it has been our tradition for over 200 years, valuing family-owned businesses.

If we can pass them through the generations without taxing them and causing them to have to be sold to pay inheritance taxes, then I think we will have maintained one of the very important economic engines of America, and we will have maintained a very strong tradition and a very strong part of the entrepreneurial spirit that has helped build this country. So we address that death tax, and we eliminate it over the 11-year period, and we significantly increase the exemption through the 10-year period.

The fourth area of major tax reduction that we hope will come out of the conference report and was a component of both the House and Senate bills is the child tax credit. We are trying to double the child tax credit over a 10-year period. Today, it is $500. We hope to increase that to $1,000.

So the four major parts of our tax relief bill will be a major tax reduction through rate reduction, marriage penalty relief, death tax relief, and the $500-per-child tax credit doubles for every family.

There are many other important elements; there are many other important tax relief measures I would like to see pass. If we can keep those four strong elements so that everyone will realize relief in a big way, I will be happy.

Hopefully, we will lower the capital gains rate and will increase the IRAs and the pension capabilities. The more people can save, the better off our country will be and the more stability our country will have. Those are all worthy. I hope we can do those at a later time.

There are some very important education deductions in the Senate bill. I hope we can keep some of them. Trying to help people with their education expenses is the most important thing we can do to increase the number of young people who get a solid education, K-12 and college.

It will be a great stepping stone to go into the next year if we can pass the tax cut bill. Right now the conference committee is working. I believe Senators are willing to stay. We thought we would be out for Memorial Day right now. We thought we would be gone. I thought I might be home with my family last night, but I am not. I am here and so is every Senator.

We hope to pass this tax reduction package. If we cannot do it today, we are willing to stay until tomorrow. We will pass it tomorrow if we can get out the tax cut package and certainly we hope we can finish this business because there will be some major changes that are dependent on our passing that tax cut legislation.

There are major changes in the Senate. They are not my first choice for changes, but nevertheless the decision has been made, so we ought to go forward and let people start making concrete plans about how the Senate is going to be organized. It is in everyone's best interest to do that.

The Senate is staying in session. We are going to make every effort to finish this tax relief bill for the American people if we have to work today, tonight, tomorrow, Sunday, Tuesday—whatever. If we can come to an agreement on a tax cut bill that has the general principles I have outlined that were passed in the House and Senate bills, then we will be in very good stead with the American people that we have done our job to the best of our ability in a bipartisan way, and we will then come back and start the business of reorganizing the Senate and continuing to do the people's work.

When we come back from Memorial Day and visiting with our people at home, we are going to start talking about the energy crisis. During Memorial Day weekend, we are going to want to start thinking about how we can address the energy crisis in a meaningful way, hopefully with some short-term relief but, more importantly, for the long term.

We have three major problems with the energy crisis in this country. We have a production problem. We are importing 56 percent of the energy needs of our country from foreign countries, and that is not a good, stable situation. We have a distribution problem in that we do not have enough refineries and pipelines to distribute the energy even if we increase production, and we have a conservation, a consumption problem. We need to encourage people in every way to conserve heating and air-conditioning in their homes, the gasoline they use in their cars.

We can encourage people to conserve. We hope they will do it anyway. With incentives, people will be even more encouraged to conserve.

We have a three-pronged energy problem: production, distribution, and consumption. That is going to be our priority when we return.

Senator MURKOWSKI has been talking about the energy crisis in this country for the last 4 years. I have been privileged to work with him, along with Senator BREAUX, Senator LANDRIEU, Senator DOMENICI, and Senator THOMAS, on this energy issue in a bipartisan way.

We have been saying for the last 4 years we have an energy crisis in this country. We have not been able to get the rest of the Members of Congress to listen. They are going to listen now, and Senator MURKOWSKI, myself, Senator BREAUX, Senator THOMAS, Senator DOMENICI, Senator LANDRIEU, Senator BINGAMAN—all of us are going to be working on an energy package that will address the three components.

It must be balanced, and we must address all three components.

I hope we can get tax relief on the table, letting people keep more of the money they earn, and send it to the President. I know he is going to sign it because he asked for it. He campaigned on it. He kept his promise; he asked for it and we are going to give it to him. Now we are going to address energy. We are going to address education reform and try to keep doing the people's business.

We have toiled in the fields. We have worked hard. We have a lot to show for that work. We will finish the job the people have asked us to do on tax relief and, hopefully, we will go home, turn a leaf, and start addressing education and energy when we return.

I am proud of the job our President is doing, and I am proud of the job the Senate has done.

I end by saying on a personal note, I am very proud of our leader, Senator TRENT LOTT, the majority leader of the Senate. He has worked very hard to push the President's programs he campaigned to do and was elected to do.

Senator LOTT has the most unfailing sense of humor and optimism of anyone I have ever met. He has been hit with a few blows in the last few weeks. I admire what he has been able to do, working with the Democrats, saying we are going to work in a bipartisan way. Through the filibuster of the tax cut bill, he kept his optimism. He never let down. He let the 50 or so amendments be voted on time after time. He kept his good humor.

Now he is facing becoming the Senate Republican leader rather than the Senate majority leader, and he is already reaching out to Senator DASCHLE, who will be the majority leader in the next couple of weeks. He said: We are going to keep working with you, and we are going to try to work in a bipartisan way to assure the people's business gets done.

My hat is off to Senator LOTT today. I have seen him up close in the last few weeks, and I can tell you he is a leader who is determined to continue to do his job in the best way he can, in the most sincere way he can, never with acrimony, always trying to do the right thing, working with a 50-50 Senate, which has not been the easiest job he has ever been handed but one he has tried to dispatch in a most fair and equitable way.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Ms. STABENOW). The Senator from Rhode Island.

CONGRATULATIONS, GENERAL LENNOX

Mr. REED. Madam President, last evening, the Senate of the United States confirmed MG William J. Lennox, Jr., of the U.S. Army, to be the 56th Superintendent of the United States Military Academy at West Point.

General Lennox is an extraordinary officer and gentleman. I have known him for a long time. In July of 1967, we entered West Point together. He proceeded through West Point and for 30 years he has been an extraordinary soldier. He represents the very best of what our Army is all about. He is a soldier and he is a scholar, but he is a soldier first.

He was commissioned in field artillery and served in various demanding assignments from platoon leader, battery commander, executive officer of the 2d Battalion, 41st Field Artillery in Germany; Deputy Commanding General to the U.S. Army Field Artillery Center and School at Fort Sill; Chief of Staff, III Corps at Fort Hood; and Assistant Chief Of Staff, United Nations Command for the United States Forces Korea. In his most recent assignment, General Lennox was the liaison for the Department of the Army to Congress.

He has performed all of these duties in extraordinary fashion. Bill Lennox understands our Army is composed of the greatest soldiers in the world. He respects these soldiers. He has committed himself to lead these magnificent men and women with the same dedication, the same professionalism, the same fidelity to duty and country that these soldiers demonstrate every day.

He is a great soldier, but he is also a distinguished scholar. Bill was assigned to the Department of English at the Military Academy after receiving a master's degree from Princeton University. He accomplished a remarkable feat while teaching English at West Point. While being active as an officer and professor at the Military Academy, he also obtained his Ph.D. from Princeton University in English.

He is a rare combination of a great soldier and a real scholar. In fact, typical of the Army life, nothing is very easy. The day Bill was scheduled to take his final Ph.D. examination and present his oral defense was also the day that his family was moving from West Point to his next assignment. So as Bill was taking these exams, and after spending the week preparing not only for a demanding analysis of English literature but also a move, fortunately, his wife and his partner, Anne, had to pack up the house and get them moving.

It illustrates something else that General Lennox brings to West Point. He has an extraordinary family. His wife Anne has not only played a large part in his life, but also a large role in his career. Their sons are extraordinarily talented young men. Together, Bill and Anne will represent to a whole generation of cadets, both male and female, the exemplar of what an Army family should be: committed, patriotic, and dedicated. They will ensure that cadets are conscious not only of their role as a professional members of the military service but also of their role as people and neighbors.

Bill is following a distinguished predecessor, LTG Dan Christman. The United States Military Academy today has compiled a remarkable record. Dan has reinvigorated the Academy in terms of academic performance, physical infrastructure, and commitment to basic values that make our Military Academy and our Army a very special one indeed.

I am confident that Bill Lennox can meet the very high standards established by Dan Christman and a whole succession of predecessors: people such as William Westmoreland, Douglas MacArthur, and Robert E. Lee. West Point has a very storied tradition and great legacy. Bill Lennox brings to that great tradition the character of a soldier and something else: Bill understands and appreciates that he is helping to train the leaders of the army of democracy; that unlike other countries around the world, we do not have a separate military caste. The men and women who lead our Army, the soldiers who man our Army come from every walk of life. They understand that they defend this great democracy, with all its contradictions, with all its unmet, untidy, and messy proceedings. They do it with great faith and great fidelity, with great competency and great patriotism.

I am delighted and honored to be able to say a few words about my friend and the next Superintendent of the United States Military Academy. I am pleased to commend Bill Lennox for his career and to celebrate his new appointment. But I am also honored to convey to my colleagues not only deep respect and affection for Bill, but also the sense that our Army is producing and promoting an individual who recognizes what we do here is very important. As Superintendent of the United States Military Academy, he will ensure that this democracy will continue.

Ultimately, it is not our weapons, but it is the brave men and women who wear the uniform of the United States that allows this experiment in freedom and democracy to continue day in and day out. He will instill in a generation of cadets a deep devotion to the credo and core values of the Military Academy: duty, honor, country. He will do that because he has lived his life according to that credo of duty, Army, country.

To Bill and Anne, good luck, Godspeed, go forward, and lead a right institution into this new century.

I yield the floor and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. CLINTON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I thank the Chair.

TAX CONFERENCE

Mr. KYL. Madam President, our Senate colleagues are anxiously awaiting the report from the conference committee that is attempting to iron out the differences between the House-passed tax bill and the Senate-passed tax bill. I thought perhaps some who are waiting for this outcome would be interested in some thoughts with respect to what has gone on so far and what we might expect from the conference. In particular, I will address remarks to the part of the bill in which I was most involved.

I begin by noting that the conferees, who are the people on the Ways and Means and Finance Committees, are busy at work trying to iron out the differences between the two bodies. Part of the success of getting the bill to the conference in the first place is attributable to the bipartisan leadership of the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, CHUCK GRASSLEY of Iowa, and MAX BAUCUS, the ranking Democrat from Montana. They worked very hard to develop a bill which wasn't all conservative or all liberal, all Republican or Democrat, but which represented views of a substantial part of the membership of the committee on both sides of the aisle. It represents most of what President Bush wanted, but not all, and not quite to the same degree, because by definition it is a compromise.

Because of that compromise, and it had support from both sides of the aisle, over the course of the last week there were 45 different attempts to amend the bill. Every one of them failed. In other words, the Members of this body voted time after time after time to support the work of the Senate Finance Committee, understanding it represents a good compromise.

Of course, there has to be another compromise, and that is with the House of Representatives. The bill the House passed represents a little more closely the views of President Bush. Naturally, those on the Republican side of the aisle are hoping there will be a compromise between the House and Senate versions that truly does reflect a meeting of the minds.

The Senate-passed bill was only a total of 10 years of $1.35 trillion because that was the compromise amount. That meant we could not grant relief quite as robust as the House had done earlier. All of the Republicans and 12 Democrats voted in favor of that bill.

From my perspective, it was not perfect; it certainly was a very good step toward tax relief, providing, most importantly, marginal tax relief from income tax rates and significant relief from the estate tax and eventual repeal, after 10 years, of the estate tax.

I am hopeful this conference committee will be able to reach a conclusion and enable the Senate to pass this bill sometime tonight or tomorrow, whatever might be the time.

I will discuss primarily the provisions relating to the phaseout and eventual elimination of the death tax in the year 2011. The death tax provisions being negotiated now, it is my understanding, are not as much as either in the House-passed bill or the Senate-passed bill. The reason is because there has been an effort to accommodate more Members with what they wanted to include in the bill. Everything else has to give. The net result is, according to my understanding, that the range they are talking about now, out of a total of $1.35 trillion, is about $135 billion, or 10 percent.

For practical purposes, about 10 percent of the tax relief under the bill goes to rate reduction of the death tax and an increase in the exemption and eventual repeal in the 10th year. President Bush, by contrast, allocated $260 billion for death tax relief. We are trying to get by to do more with less.

Probably the most important thing is there has been an understanding both in the House and in the Senate reflecting the will of the American people that there is something terribly unfair about a provision of the Tax Code that literally taxes people because they die; not because they sold an asset; not because they saved or invested or had some other kind of economic transaction that they fully knew the tax consequences of but, rather, they are taxed because they die.

We have come to conclude, representing the view of the majority of Americans, there is something very unfair about taxing people after they die. Actually, you are not even taxing the person who died. You are taxing that person's heirs—the spouse, the children—at the very worst time of their life following this tragic event. It is not fair. It doesn't represent good tax policy.

There is a good way to substitute the capital gains tax for the estate tax, so that the assets end up being taxed but being taxed the same as any other assets, based upon an economic decision, if and when those assets are sold, and then taxed at the capital gains rates. But a tax is not imposed at the time of death. Fundamentally, death should not be a taxable event and that is a core principle that will come out of this tax bill. It is a core principle embodied in the repeal of the estate tax, sometimes called the death tax.

To me, the most interesting thing to come out of this debate is the realization that the American people have a fundamental sense of fairness. When you ask them whether it is fair to tax at the rate of about 25 percent, for example, they say no; we ought to get taxes down.

When you ask them if it is fair that death should be a taxable event, they say no, even if they do not think they are ever going to benefit personally from repeal of the estate tax. Fairness is what this effort to repeal the death tax is all about.

What I mostly wanted to do today is to report the results of a national poll of just this week. So we are not talking about something a long time ago—just this week, a very objective poll. So it has a very low margin of error. It is a poll by the respected McLaughlin & Associates of a thousand likely voters from around this country.

Here is one of the questions they asked. They wanted to ask the question, in effect, in the worst way possible. They said: Do you believe it is fair or unfair for Congress to impose a 40-percent or greater tax on an estate worth $1 billion?

You could say, Do you think the death tax is unfair? I guarantee at townhall meetings people say: No, the death tax is not fair. That is not really putting the question in the most objective way. But when you ask: Is it fair or unfair for Congress to impose a tax of, be specific, 40 percent or more on estates—you don't use the death tax terminology—on estates of $1 billion or more, that is the loading of the question. That is the part that biases it, $1 billion or more, should you tax them at more than 40 percent?

Do you know what the answer is? By 60 percent the American people say: No, it is unfair. Only half that many said it was fair. How many of those people do you think would benefit from a repeal of that estate tax? Out of 1000, I don't know, maybe one but maybe not. There are not many people in this country leaving an estate of $1 billion. Yet all Americans realize it is fundamentally unfair to impose a tax of more than 40 percent.

Of course, I might add the law currently is that it is about a 60-percent tax rate, but the question was not biased.

I think what that shows is right this week the vast majority, by 2 to 1, of Americans believe that even a tax rate of 40 percent is unfair. The reason that is significant is in the Senate bill we were not able to reduce the tax rate on estates of even $5 million, let alone $1 billion, to that 40 percent level. As a matter of fact, I think we got it down to 45 percent, if I am not in error. Yes, we reduced the rate from 60 percent down to 45 percent. The House got it down into the 30s. I have forgotten whether it is 37 or 39 but something like that. We ought to be working to reduce the rate below 40 percent before the tax is finally eliminated in the 10th year. But we were not able to do that. I hope that is something the conference committee will work to do, to try to bring that rate down just as much as they possibly can.

What is interesting about this survey that shows that American people are fundamentally fair minded is that the results were the same across economic and political classes. For example, just as many voters who earned under $20,000 as those earning over $100,000 said the practice was unfair; exactly 61 percent in both cases. It is consistent across the political spectrum, very similar. Among Republicans, 65 percent said it was unfair. Remember the baseline is 61 percent. Slightly more Republicans, 65 percent, said it was unfair. Slightly fewer Democrats, 54 percent, said it was unfair; and Independents, 62 percent, almost right on the button.

The bottom line is, whether Republican or Democrat or independent, a substantial majority believe that even a 40-percent tax on $1 billion estate is unfair.

The other interesting thing is this survey tracks all the other surveys I have seen over time. I will go back just 1 year because that is a nice frame. But the clear and resounding message is the estate tax is unfair and ought to be stricken from the code. The same McLaughlin & Associates conducted a poll earlier this year, in January. It found then that 89 percent of the people surveyed believed it was not fair for Government to tax a person's earnings while it is being earned and then tax it again after the person dies—which is exactly what the estate tax does.

Mr. President, 79 percent approved the idea of abolishing the estate tax—79 percent. That is very consistent with other surveys as well.

I went back a year ago because there is an interesting Gallup Poll that was done just a year ago—not quite a year ago. It found 60 percent of the people supported the repeal, even though about three-fourths of them believed they would never receive any direct benefit from that repeal.

Again, it goes to the notion of fairness. People believe an unfair tax should be repealed even if it is not going to help them at all. The reality is it probably would help them in terms of its indirect benefits. I noted during the debate on the estate tax the economic benefits to repeal, in terms of new jobs created, the infusion of capital into the economy, the growth of the economy—all these things would be significantly benefited from a repeal of the estate tax. Of course, that benefits all Americans.

As John F. Kennedy said, in a different context, with respect to tax relief, "A rising tide lifts all boats." So if you can help the American economy, it helps everybody in the economy, even if you are at the lower end. So the reality is, repealing the estate tax does help all Americans. But it obviously helps some more than others. It especially helps those in two categories: First of all, those who pay the tax. That is not very many people. It is maybe in the hundreds of thousands—maybe a million, I don't know. But if you take members of families who are directly affected by this, clearly it is a number that is very much in the millions, if at all. Yet Americans fundamentally believe it is unfair to tax them.

The other larger group that is affected by the tax is, of course, all the people, especially the small business people—family-owned farms and family-owned businesses—who have to spend their money to try to plan their estate in such a way as to minimize the estate tax liability. This is difficult and expensive.

The Women-Owned Business Association—by the way, women-owned businesses represent more than half the small business in this country. They surveyed their members and found—just 2 years ago I believe it was—the average small business spent $60,000 to do this expensive estate planning.

I note there was an op-ed in the Washington Post this morning by a very wealthy American who testified before the Finance Committee. He said it was really a shame we were going to do away with the estate tax. Of course, his point was he didn't think the American people really believed that way; yet I think the survey results show that they are. But people like this individual have the money to do the estate planning. They do not suffer from the tax. It is the small businesses and family-owned businesses and farms that end up having to pay a lot of money to buy insurance, to pay lawyers and accountants and estate planners to try to avoid the tax.

The real cost of the tax is at least as much, and probably more, in the wasted money spent to avoid paying the tax than it is the revenue to the Federal Government in the first place. Mr. President, 2 years ago when the tax collected about $20 billion, there is a study that showed that almost exactly the same amount of money, by coincidence, about $23 billion additional, was spent by people to avoid paying the estate tax or minimize their liability. So it is a very inefficient tax, as economists Henry Aaron and Alicia Munnell said in writing a 1992 study. They said death taxes "have failed to achieve their intended purpose. They raise little revenue. They impose large excess burdens. They are unfair."

I think the thing to note at this point in time in this Chamber, at about 2:20 on Friday afternoon, is that the conference committee is working away trying hard to bridge the gap between the House and Senate versions of the estate tax. I think all of us are hopeful that they will conclude their work so we can vote on the bill and provide tax relief to Americans.

This is a bill which provides relief all the way from the refundable tax credits, literally providing money to people who do not pay taxes, all the way up to those few people who, as I said, would receive relief from the estate tax. But most importantly, it would provide marginal rate relief for all Americans.

We have an opportunity now. I hope that we can drive the rates of the estate tax down prior to the repeal but, in any event, we will have struck a blow for fairness in this country by reducing marginal rates; reducing, if not eliminating, the marriage penalty, which is very unfair; and, finally, getting rid of a tax that a majority of Americans believe is very unfair, a tax that literally requires people to pay money to the Government because they died, the estate tax.

Madam President, we have a wonderful opportunity. I hope the conferees come back soon and we will have a chance to vote on this legislation.

Again, I commend the members of the conference and, in particular, the bipartisan leadership in the Senate, Senator GRASSLEY and Senator BAUCUS, for the fine work they have done to get it this far.

I just hope now we can conclude the work and send it down to the President for his signature and the benefit of the American people.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. THOMAS. Madam President, I yield myself a few minutes to talk about energy this afternoon, if I may, please.

First, I thank my friend from Arizona for a very complete discussion of the tax reduction bill. Certainly, it is one of the most important things we will do during this Congress, and, indeed, over the next number of years.

The whole question, in the broad sense, of how you do taxes is very interesting. One question is, How are they fair? How do you make them fair among all the taxpayers? Another question is certainly the amount. How do you justify taking this money from citizens and it going to the Government? And when you have more than enough, what do you do with the surplus?

So I thank the Senator very much.

IMPORTANT ISSUES BEFORE THE SENATE

Mr. THOMAS. Madam President, we, of course, have been dealing, over the last several weeks, with some of the most important issues that will be dealt with in this entire year, as we should. One, of course, is the budget. I think our success in the budget is holding down spending to something somewhat below what it has been in the past. Because we have had a surplus, the expenditures have gone up really more than you would imagine they would in terms of inflation and those kinds of things.

So this budget was held—I think the President asked for 5 percent—to a little in excess of that, but, nevertheless, a reasonable budget of which we can be proud.

The question now, of course, is staying within the budget. The budget is not an imposition of a limit; it is a pattern and a scheme to try to stay within. But it does not necessarily ensure that. That will be the real challenge.

The second thing we have dealt with, and have not yet completed, of course, is education. For most people in this country, education is the first issue they mention when they talk about issues.

Again, there are some rather basic issues that really ought to be talked about and decided. One issue is, What is the role of the Federal Government in elementary and secondary education? I think most of us would agree—and our experience has been—that State and local governments have the principal responsibilities in education. With that certainly ought to go the opportunity to make the decisions on a local basis.

The schools in Wyoming, obviously, have different needs, and have different uses for the dollars, than in areas of the country such as Pittsburgh or New York. And, therefore, local decision-makers ought to have a chance to be able to use those dollars in the ways they are needed.

Another issue in education, of course, is the basic question of, What is the role, in terms of expenditures, of the Federal Government? I think over the past number of years the Federal Government's contribution financially has been something less than 7 percent. So it is a relatively small contribution but a very important one and has caused us to have some of the programs that, of course, are very essential to our young people and very essential to education.

The tax bill that has been talked about is probably the most important thing we will do for a very long time. Hopefully, we will conclude that this afternoon. We will return a substantial amount of the surplus to those people who have paid it in and, at the same time, retain enough money to do the things that most people believe are a high priority; that is, to pay down the debt—to pay down all of the debt that is available to be paid down—to do something more with Social Security and pharmaceuticals, to ensure that Medicare is strong and continues in the future, and, of course, to have some flexibility so that there will be money there for increased expenditures for the military and for security.

I think all of those areas will be covered in this proposal that is before us.

The next issue that has a much higher profile now than normally is the question of energy. Of course, one of the reasons that it is now on so many people's minds is because prices have gone up substantially. There is the difficulty in California, the shortages that have occurred there. You can talk in many ways about why it has happened and what was the cause, but, nevertheless, it is there. Certainly there are some fairly interesting things that have happened there that have brought about the difficulties in electric energy.

But energy, of course, has been an issue for some time. It is not a brand new idea. It isn't hard to understand that when the market messages tell you that consumption is going up and production is going down that you are going to have a wreck inevitably and you need to do something about it.

It is not hard to tell that we have put ourselves at risk when we find ourselves depending nearly 60 percent on oil imported into this country as opposed to domestic production. That is an increase that has changed substantially over the last several years.

I suppose one might also say that it is not hard to imagine that you have some problems when you really have not had an energy policy for the past number of years, so that whatever has been done has not been part of a coherent plan to provide sufficient energy.

So I am very pleased to applaud the President and Vice President DICK CHENEY for the effort that they have put in—and immediately put in—to the energy issue. The White House energy task force, chaired by Vice President CHENEY, has produced an energy package that has now been presented to the public and to the Congress with some 105 proposals that need to be considered, some of which can be done by administrative fiat within the Government. Others will have to come to the Congress, of course, to be acted upon.

I have been serving on the Energy Committee for some time and have been very interested in public lands and the interior. It has been very interesting that we focused entirely on the Department of Energy which, in turn, has not focused much on energy but, indeed, has had most of its focus, over the last several years, on one of its other responsibilities, which is nuclear: nuclear waste, nuclear security, Los Alamos. Those kinds of things have been almost the entire attention of the Department of Energy as opposed to energy.

So it is significant to me that in this work group the Vice President has included not only the Secretary and the Department of Energy, as, of course, it should be, but also the Department of Interior, which manages our public lands—which have some of the greatest energy reserves—and also EPA, the Environmental Protection Agency, which has had a great deal to do with the production of energy and the regulations that have been promulgated.

So I think it was an excellent idea to have this collaborative effort, to bring several different agencies together. I hope they continue to be a part of dealing with the whole energy issue.

So I certainly support a program that recognizes that we have significant energy demands and one that begins to look for a solution—a solution that also includes conservation and the protection of the environment. I think those are very key elements.

I come from the State of Wyoming. We have a good deal of energy production in our State. Some call it the Btu capital of the world. We have probably the largest reserve of coal in the United States, as well as natural gas and oil. We have uranium, all those kinds of things. We also have some of the most beautiful mountains and flats and prairies of any State in the Union. And we have, for a number of years, produced energy. We intend to continue to do that. We intend to continue to do it in such a way that you can protect the environment at the same time you have multiple uses of those lands. But there will be lands that will not be used for a multiple use. They have been set aside as wilderness. They have been set aside as national parks, and that is as it should be. And so we do have to differentiate.

But in the policy, of course, we talk about energy and fuel diversity, which I think is very important. Certainly we are going to have a number of kinds of fuels that we can use, coal being one.

There is emphasis on clean coal technology so we continue to research ways that coal, which now produces about 52 percent of our electric generation, can be used with less intrusion into the air. We can do that. In this plan there are opportunities for that.

Renewables: We need to take a look at the long-term importance of renewables. Certainly all of us would like to see more power generated from wind and solar. Currently only about 1 percent of our consumption is produced by renewables. It can be greater, and we hope it will be.

Hydro: Of course, we need to take a look at our opportunities for renew-ables in hydro. Interestingly enough, some of the environmentalists who are critical of the President's plan more recently were asking to tear down dams. It is sort of a paradox.

Nuclear has a role, certainly. We have seen over the last few years that nuclear-generated power is probably the most clean power that is available and can be done in a safe manner. We need to do more there. We need to do something, however, about the waste storage, of course. That has not yet been resolved.

These are some of the things that can be done, and I hope we do them. We have an opportunity to set out a policy and then use a combination of production and conservation to protect our environment. Those are the challenges we can indeed meet.

I yield time to the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

TAXES

Mr. BENNETT. Madam President, we are all waiting for the conferees to come back to us with the tax bill. As we do that, I thought it might be appropriate for me to talk a little bit about some of the rhetoric that has surrounded the issue of taxes in the time we have together.

If I may, I will be a little personal because I have experience with the issue of marginal rates which might be of some value to this debate and which I would like to share.

As many Members of this body know, I was one of the founders of a business that started in what the pundits have come to call the decade of greed; that is, the 1980s. In that period of time, that which has been most commented on and most decried by the pundits is the fact that the top marginal tax rate was 28 percent.

We are talking now about an attempt on the part of President Bush to bring that tax rate down to 33. It is pretty clear from the conversations I have had with the conferees that that is not going to happen. I think it will be somewhere in the neighborhood of 35.

Someone said: Why does Michael Jordan need a tax cut? Why does Ross Perot need a tax cut? Why does Donald Trump need a tax cut? Isn't it proper that they continue to pay the lion's share of the taxes in this country? And they do. The people in the top 1 percent pay most of the taxes. To put it in another statistic: The top 400 taxpayers—this is less than 1,000 tax returns—pay more than 40 million of the taxpayers down below; 400 pay more taxes in dollars received than 4 million people down below.

Why do those 400 need a tax cut? They have plenty of money. That is the argument we hear.

I will concede that I don't think Michael Jordan needs a tax cut; I don't think Donald Trump needs a tax cut; and I don't think Ross Perot needs a tax cut. But under the Constitution, we have equal protection of the laws, which means if you provide a tax cut for someone, for a good and logical reason, someone else who happens to be in the same boat, even if he is rich, gets the same equal protection of the law and gets the same tax cut. So it is the side effect, if you will, that Michael Jordan gets a tax cut.

Here is the experience I had which I think gets ignored over and over and over again in the rhetoric that is thrown out with respect to tax rates. As I say, my associates and I started our business during the decade of greed when everybody was saying it was so terrible that the top marginal tax rate was 28 percent. We used, as most businesses did at that time and many businesses still do now, a provision of the tax law that is known as section S of the tax law. Those who use it are known as S corporations as a result of their election.

All that means simply is that the profits of the corporation are not taxed at the corporate level. They flow through, as the Tax Code provides, to the individual tax returns of the shareholders.

We had five principal shareholders. That meant that as the corporation earned money, that money flowed through to our tax returns. If I can be fairly dramatic, in terms of the impact on me, I was earning my salary as the CEO of that company, which I and my wife thought was a relatively modest salary, but I filed a tax return showing that I had earned more than $1 million. Why? Because my share of the profits of the corporation showed up on my tax return.

Now it made absolutely no difference whatsoever to my take-home pay, which was tied to my salary, because the corporation did not give me any money beyond the money necessary to pay my share of the taxes. Why would we do that?

There are two reasons we made the S corporation. The first and primary reason is that we wanted to avoid double taxation. If the corporation earned $1 and paid corporate taxes on it—and let's take the corporate rate at the time, which I believe was 38 percent—if the corporation earned $1 and paid 38 cents of that dollar to the Federal taxes and then gave the resulting money to the shareholder, the shareholder would then have to pay taxes a second time on the money that came as a dividend. If you make an S corporation, you only pay taxes once instead of twice. That is the primary reason people make the S choice.

The second reason was that if we did the S choice, we only paid 28 percent on that $1 earned instead of 38 percent on that $1 earned. Naturally, we wanted to save the extra 10 percent, 10 cents on the dollar.

Many people have the idea that when you earn money, you buy yachts and you take vacations and you waste the money overseas in what the Scriptures would call "riotous living." In fact, of course, when you are growing a business, you need every penny. It goes into inventory. It goes into accounts receivable. It goes into capital investments. If the business is growing—and our business was doubling every year; it did that for about 6 years running—you are always behind.

Indeed, I say to the students in business school, when I am asked to talk to them about this, the most terrifying thing you can do in a start-up business is make a profit, because then you owe taxes. Uncle Sam shows up and wants his tax money in cash.

You don't have it in cash because, as I say, your profits are all tied up in inventory, all tied up financing your growth. You end up, in most instances, borrowing cash from the bank in order to pay your taxes.

We paid a marginal rate of 28 cents out of every dollar we earned, and we plowed every one of the remaining 72 cents back into that business to make it grow. Our salaries did not increase. My take-home pay actually went down when that extra $1 million showed up on my tax return, because then I was being treated, as far as the Federal Government was concerned, as if I were a basketball star earning that $1 million, and that wiped out all of my deductions. That may not matter much to some people, but we had six children at the time, and that constituted a fairly significant amount of deductions that all of a sudden we couldn't take because we were "rich."

My take-home pay on my W-2 pay hadn't changed. The amount of money I was being paid by the corporation had not changed.

All that had changed was the bookkeeping entry on my tax return. Well, I am not complaining because the business was successful—so successful that we could look back on it now and realize that that business started literally in somebody's basement, with 2 employees, a husband and a wife, that then doubled to 4 employees, and that is how many they had when I joined them; I made No. 5. That business is now employing about 4,000 people. They are paying literally millions of dollars in Federal taxes, both the corporation taxes, the income taxes of the payrolls that have been generated with those 4,000 folks, plus the suppliers, plus all the rest of it. It is a fairly typical American success story.

The point of all this is not to bother you with details of my experience, but to point out that the difference between the top marginal rate of 28 percent that we pay and the current effective rate of 42 percent is 50 percent of the original amount; 14 points out of the 28 percent have been added on to the 28 percent. I suggest to you that if we were trying to start that business today, we would not have been able to finance it.

Many of the people who looked at this business said to us: How are you doing this? This growth is phenomenal. How are you creating these jobs?

We said we did it with internally generated cash. We didn't sell stock; we didn't go to the bank, although we had a credit line at the bank, of course. But we did it because we were able to save enough of the profit dollars we earned to pay for the growth of that business and create those jobs.

You can never say anything with certainty with respect to hypotheticals, but it is my conviction that if we were starting that business today, facing an effective tax rate of 42 percent, we would not succeed. We could not afford to do it. Therefore, we would not have created the 4,000 jobs that exist now.

The point I want to make with respect to the top marginal rate is that it does not just apply to the Michael Jordans and Donald Trumps of this world. That marginal rate applies to the entrepreneurs who are trying to do the same thing my associates and I were lucky enough to do—start a business, create jobs, add to the growth of this country, and discover as they go along that they need to hang on to every penny they earn to finance that growth, and every additional percentage point that we in the Congress put on the marginal rate hampers the opportunity of people to do that.

Senator GRASSLEY, chairman of the Finance Committee, has offered the statistics of how many hundreds of thousands of small businesses trying to become big businesses are affected, how many hundreds of thousands of them, with their subsequent millions of employees, would be benefited by the kind of tax relief at the top brackets that President Bush is urging us to pass.

We never hear that from the folks in the national media. Sometimes I wish that some of the people who are the talking heads on the shows on Sunday, who pontificate with such certainty about economic matters, might just take a few weeks off from their situation in front of the cameras and come out into the real world and try starting a business, try employing people, try creating jobs, and discover that life is a little different. Some in this Chamber have that experience.

Comments were made by one of the more distinguished Members of this Chamber who ran for President in 1972—the Democratic nominee, Senator McGovern. He was firmly and solidly in the camp of those who insist that top marginal rates should be higher and higher and Government should regulate more and more. He tells the story of how, after his political career was over, he still had enough notoriety left over that he could give some speeches and earn some money for those. As he was paid honoraria for the speeches, he accumulated some money and he decided: Now is the time for me to relax a little. I will buy a business.

He bought an inn in New England. Maybe he watched Bob Newhart's show and he thought that would be a nice thing for him to do—whatever. He has come back and said: If I had had the experience actually running a business in the real world before I became a Senator instead of afterwards, I would have been a very different kind of Senator. I would have had a very different view about regulations and taxes and the way the Government interferes with people's lives.

This came from a man who at the time was labeled the most left of all of the Presidential nominees put up by either party in a generation. Coming back from the actual experience, he finds things are really different in the real world than they are on the Sunday talk shows, and sometimes as they are portrayed in the Senate.

So while it may sound too personal for me to share this experience, I think it may have some value because we need to understand, as we are voting on this marginal tax rate, that we are talking about something far more than just the amount of taxes Michael Jordan or Donald Trump or Ross Perot may pay. We are talking about hundreds of thousands of businesses in this country that have been slowed in their growth, slowed in their ability to create jobs by seeing a jump in the effective rate go from 28 percent, which it was prior to 1991, to an effective rate of 42 percent now. And then people are beginning to wonder why there are some slowdowns in the economy.

There is another point I want to make about this issue and the rhetoric that has gone around about it. We are told over and over again that the primary benefits go to the top 20 percent and the folks at the bottom 20 percent don't get anything out of this. That is terrible, we are told, and we must somehow find a way to use the Tax Code to take the money from the top 20 percent and make it available to the bottom 20 percent.

There are several things that need to be said with respect to this argument. The first is the statistically obvious one. As long as you are dealing with 100 percent and dealing in percentages, you are dealing in what the mathematicians call a zero sum game; that is, you take a sum from this side, it must be added to that side, and everything in the end, one subtracted from the other, gives you zero, because everything equals.

The economy is not a zero sum game. Neither is society. If you are talking about the top 20 percent, you will always have a top 20 percent. You can't have a 100-percent scale without statistically and mathematically having a top 20 percent. So the top 20 percent will never disappear. No matter how much you make an attempt to take money from the top 20 percent and put it in the bottom 20 percent, mathematically, somebody else will always show up in the top 20 percent.

The second point, however, is the more important one, and that is, in America, more than in any other economy and any other society in the world, there is fluidity all up and down the economic scale.

If I may be personal once again, let me demonstrate that. I have been in the bottom 20 percent. I am an entrepreneur. I start businesses. Most of the businesses I have started have failed. That is the way entrepreneurs live. I sat down when I got an award as entrepreneur of the year and said: Am I really?

I did a little calculation, and up to that time I had been involved in 11 different businesses that would be considered startups or turnarounds, 11 different entrepreneurial activities. Of those 11, 4 failed outright—just flat died. Four we managed to sell before there was any profit or loss; we broke even and got out. Only three of those businesses survived. Of the three that survived, only two really were major successes. One of the three was a minor success that was on a plus, so I have to include it. So there is the track record: Out of 11, basically there are 2 success stories.

While I was in one of the others that was not a success story, I was in the bottom 20 percent. Indeed, I was in the bottom of the bottom. I was getting no income. I was dipping into my savings, and when the savings were gone, I was going into debt. I was paying the payroll of the business on my American Express card, and then my American Express card got canceled because I hadn't made the payments on it.

Statistically, I was in the bottom 20 percent. It was not 5 years after that somewhat dispiriting experience that I was in the top 20 percent. One of those entrepreneurial efforts hit, and when it hits, it hits rapidly, at least in my experience. I went through the bottom 20 percent, the next 20 percent, the next 20 percent, the next 20 percent, up to the top 20 percent pretty fast.

Did I get from the bottom 20 percent to the top 20 percent because the Government took money from the top 20 percent and gave it to me while I was in the bottom 20 percent? No, I got there because the American economy makes it possible for entrepreneurs to have this kind of success story.

Quite frankly, since I have been in the Senate, I have gotten out of the top 20 percent. I have started coming back down again. That sort of fluidity happens to us all the time.

I have used the name of Donald Trump. Donald Trump has been from the top to the bottom to the top again as his real estate ventures go good and go bad.

The problem is not the statistical one of where people are at any one moment in time. I have six children. Right now some of them are doing pretty well. I have one child who, with her husband, probably is pretty close to the bottom 20 percent. He is not earning anything, and my daughter is supporting him. Gee, isn't that terrible, until you find out he is a student at the Harvard Law School and has pretty good prospects of good earnings once he gets out. He is going into debt now. He is in the bottom 20 percent, but when he gets his degree from the Harvard Law School, I believe he is going to be in fairly high demand with people dangling $125,000 a year starting salaries in front of him, and he will move very rapidly from one to the other.

The problem we should be talking about is not the dry statistics of income, it is the reality of skills. The income gap in this country is not something that can be addressed with the Tax Code. The income gap in this country is a skill gap and has to be addressed through a series of educational initiatives, retraining initiatives, both government and private, and a recognition that the people who have the skills in the freedom of the American economic and environmental system have the opportunity to move up. But when they move up, they will always be replaced statistically with someone who is earning less than they are who ends up in the bottom 20 percent.

Interestingly enough, when we had hearings before the Banking Committee on the issue of the Tax Code and tax relief, and Alan Greenspan was testifying before us, one of the members of the committee said to him: Mr. Chairman, with respect to the good economy we are enjoying, tell us who has benefited the most in terms of the economic strata of the United States, which group has gotten the greatest benefit out of this good economy?

Knowing the political orientation of the Senator who asked the question, I think he was expecting and hoping that Alan Greenspan would say: Well, this economy has mainly benefited people at the top and the people at the bottom have not gotten anything out of it.

I think the Senator was a little surprised when Alan Greenspan said: Without question, the people who have benefited the most from this good economy are the people at the bottom of the economic scale.

Then he was asked how can that be because statistically the top 20 percent has gotten richer than the bottom 20 percent. But Alan Greenspan pointed out a great truth: It probably does not make any difference—I am not quoting him now; this is my summary—it probably does not make any difference whatsoever to Bill Gates whether his portfolio is $60 billion or $80 billion in terms of his lifestyle. He still has his big house at $60 billion. He still has all of his opportunities at $60 billion. His life has not changed at all if it goes from $60 billion to $80 billion.

However, someone who cannot get a job, who suddenly finds that he or she can and become gainfully employed for the first time in his or her life sees an enormous change, and that, indeed, has been the primary impact of this good economy. It has virtually, at least for a period of time, eliminated unemployment.

I can remember when we thought structural unemployment in this country was about 6 percent, and when we got down to 6 percent, we had functional full employment. We saw unemployment go down below 4 percent at times in the recent boom situation, and who got those jobs? People who were unqualified for the jobs that were available when unemployment was higher.

I remember visiting with employers in my State and asking them: What is your biggest progress in this booming economy?

They said: We cannot hang on to workers. We will take any warm body. We need workers.

I said: Will you take the unskilled?

They said: Absolutely, we will take the unskilled and we will spend the money training them; we will spend the money making them skilled because we have to have people.

One employer said: We have a job fair opening where we rent a room and ask people to come in. They come in, we make a presentation to them. Say there are 30 or 40 people in the room. We make a presentation for an hour. We break for coffee and only 10 of them come back afterwards. All 40 of them are unemployed and want a job, but 30 of the 40 decided they did not like the way we made the presentation. And they can always walk down the street and get a job someplace else.

That is the impact of a booming economy on the people at the bottom. It gives them an opportunity that will make a more dramatic change in their lives than the change in the lives of the people at the top. That is what Alan Greenspan was talking about when he said in terms of the impact for good on people's lives, there is no question whatsoever but that the booming economy we are having has affected for good more people at the bottom than it has people at the top.

Yet from the rhetoric we hear around this Chamber, we are told over and over that if we do not somehow take money away from the people at the top and shift it to the people at the bottom, we are going to destroy American democracy.

This class warfare kind of rhetoric simply does not jibe with reality. It does not jibe with what we have experienced in the last 10 years. It does not jibe with what the economists tell us is reality, and it certainly does not jibe with that which the small business man and small business woman will tell you in terms of actual job creation.

Of course, the statistic we need to keep in mind is that the great job-creating machine in this country is not the Fortune 500. The great job-creating machine that is creating new jobs is not headed by Exxon, General Motors, Ford, and DuPont. No, the jobs are being created the way the jobs were created in the circumstance of which I was fortunate enough to be a part: A company started in a basement by a husband and a wife that within a decade has created 4,000 jobs, and in the process of creating those 4,000 direct jobs, among the suppliers, there are another 2,000 to 3,000 to 4,000 jobs as people are hired to produce the articles that our company has to buy in order to provide its product to its customers.

As we wait for the report to come in from the conferees as to where they are going to put the marginal rate, I wanted to take the time to make it clear that the political rhetoric that flows around this issue really has little or no connection with reality.

In reality, a lower marginal rate primarily helps small businesses to grow. A lower marginal rate is crucial to the rate by which small businesses grow. The rate at which small businesses grow is the most important dynamic in terms of how the economy is growing, and for those who get statistically hung up on the gap between the top 20 percent and the bottom 20 percent, they must remember and recognize that in America, more than any other society in the world, the freedom to move both up and down the ladder is greater than anywhere else.

If we can understand those things, we can come to a more intelligent decision with respect to where the marginal rate will be. I have no illusions that the conferees will bring the marginal rate in at the level that I would like, but I hope that once it comes in, in future Congresses we can keep all of this in mind and take another bite at the apple at some particular point.

My desire would be to bring the top marginal rate back down to where it was during the decade of greed where, quite frankly, we sowed the seeds of the great economic expansion about which we are all excited and for which politicians of both parties have been taking credit when, in fact, they have had little or nothing to do with it.

I think the work I did at the Franklin Company before I came here had more to do with creating jobs than anything I have done since I have been here. I want to get the marginal rate back down so others who are trying the same kinds of things we did will have the same opportunity that we did.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAGEL). The Senator from Michigan.

Ms. STABENOW. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to speak up to 15 minutes in morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TAXES AND THE ECONOMY

Ms. STABENOW. Mr. President, I rise to speak also about the tax cut proposal, about the debate on how to keep the economy going. I rise in great respect for my friend from Utah, who was successful in business, and lays out a prospective about how to keep the economy going.

While I share his view that we need to be focused on a skilled workforce and that is critical to keeping our economy moving, he and I represent two different views of how best to do that. That is the debate going on in Washington now. I characterize it as a debate about whether or not the 1980s or the 1990s worked. I argue the bill that will come back—whether tonight, tomorrow, or next week—is a bill based on the notion that the economic policy of the 1980s worked. I argue from the Michigan standpoint, and anyone in Michigan, any families, businesses, farmers I represent, would indicate the 1980s were not a good time for Michigan. We had high unemployment, high interest rates. We saw massive debts both at the State and national level. It is the same kind of approach I fear will be happening today with the policies being laid out.

No. 1 in the debate is how to give a tax cut. Is it supply side, as my colleague talked about?

The proposal we are being asked to vote on is a very large tax cut, two-thirds to the upper income wage earners, those in the top 10 percent. And then we wait for it to trickle down. My folks in Michigan have been waiting for the tax cut of the 1980s to trickle down and hit their pocketbooks. Many have not seen it. We are being asked now to, once again, place it there. I am supportive and have voted for tax relief and will continue to do that. I prefer to do tax relief that goes directly into the pockets of the majority of Americans.

Contrary to this tax cut, I believe we should eliminate the marriage penalty, not in 6 years, as in this bill, but now. Talk about unfair, that is extremely unfair. We are a country that values family and marriage. Yet we have a tax structure that unfairly penalizes those who are married. I support a proposal and did vote for a proposal to give relief now to married couples by eliminating that unfair tax penalty.

There is a difference in approach. The approach being put forward says a very large supply-side tax cut will trickle down. Coupled, in the 1980s, with a very large increase in defense spending and not controlling other spending, what happened? We tripled the national debt, interest rates were at the highest level ever, and employment went down.

In the 1990s we tried something different. Tough decisions were made. Revenue was put aside to pay down the national debt that had been tripled in the 1980s. We paid it down, slowed the rate of spending. We were able to make sure we were putting aside money for Social Security and Medicare and paying those dollars back instead of spending it on other programs. We were putting those dollars back and paying back Medicare and Social Security trust funds. We have had very tough decisions made to balance the budget.

And we did something important in the 1990s. We focused on real investments in education, job training to get that skilled workforce, and in research, health research, technology research, developed the new technologies that when combined with an educated workforce would increase our labor productivity.

It is a very different approach. We focused on growing the economy by investing in education, paying down our debt, investing in research and technology development, and balancing the budget.

What happened? In the 1990s, high interest rates went down. We have seen home ownership up. In my State of Michigan, more and more young people and older people are able to have their own home, an important part of the American dream. We have seen unemployment, jobs, go up in the 1990s as a result of this approach to the economy. We saw budget deficits go down and the Federal deficit go down.

This is a no-brainer. What do we want? The 1980s or 1990s? Yet what comes before us in the year 2001 is a set of proposals that takes us back to what happened in the 1980s. We are seeing a proposal that gives two-thirds of the tax cut to those at the very top, hoping it will trickle down.

We know as soon as this bill passes there will be requests for very large increases in defense again, and other increases will come forth. To me, what is most intolerable, is the tax cut proposed spends $550 billion of Medicare and Social Security to pay for it. That is not acceptable.

Over the next 10 years, we are seeing a tax cut and budget proposals that spend Medicare and Social Security right before the baby boomers begin retiring in 11 years. There is no time to pay it back. We are going to be facing massive debt if that is the case. I am very concerned about that.

Right now we are seeing the financial managers in the country, in the private sector, who are beginning to see it, as well. While short-term interest rates are going down, long-term high interest rates are going up in anticipation of the country going back into massive debt.

I urge Members, it is not too late to stop this train, to put some brakes on it. I propose we create, as we did on this floor—we had an amendment we tried twice to pass—a budget trigger which says if the phase-in of the tax cut dips into Social Security and Medicare to pay for it, if we go back into debt, we will suspend that action, further tax cuts or spending, until the revenue comes in.

In Michigan, we call that common sense. Don't spend it unless you have it. We believe fiscal responsibility, keeping the budget balanced, paying down the debt, protecting Social Security and Medicare are critical and should not be compromised for any other actions no matter how well intended. We have a train going down the track. My fear is there will be no budget trigger to stop the train before it goes off the track. That is common sense.

We are going to be asked at some point to vote on a final budget proposal that spends Medicare and Social Security moneys for the future. When we look at the fundamental unfairness, we see that those who are most dependent on Social Security, most in need of Medicare health benefits, are those who receive little or nothing from the tax cut but their Social Security and Medicare, will help pay for it.

It is not fair. It is just simply not fair. We have in front of us a proposal that kept us moving in the same policy track as the 1990s. I urge we still have time to consider that. It is a proposal that gives tax relief but makes sure we condition it upon using none of Social Security and Medicare and that we keep our commitment to fiscal responsibility and paying down our debt while we do it.

The proposal I support also would put aside dollars for education to continue our ability to keep labor productivity going in our country. When we asked Chairman Greenspan at the Budget Committee hearing what was the one thing driving this economy, he said it was increased labor productivity. So why in the world would we be creating a situation where education funds are going to have to be cut and research funds and technology development will have to be cut in order to pay for the tax cut in front of us?

I believe common sense would dictate we pay down the debt, we protect Medicare and Social Security, we give a major tax cut focused on our middle-income families and small businesses and family farmers, and that we can do that and also be able to continue investments to keep the economy going.

This is the approach that worked. It is hard to argue with success. The policies in the 1990s were successful because of the hard work of both the private sector and the public sector to move us out of debt, to balance the budget, and to make investments in education and the economy.

I hope we will take a deep breath and reconsider what is about to be done in the next few hours or the next few days. We can do better than that.

Also, when we talk about putting money back in people's pockets, there are multiple ways to do that, all which I support, which we need to do and can do while being fiscally responsible. No. 1 is a tax cut. No. 2 is keeping interest rates down so your mortgage is down, as are your car payment and your student loan—those things are low enough for people to be able to afford those items for their families.

Finally, for the senior citizen in this country who gets up in the morning and sits at the table and decides, do I eat today or get my medicine, which too many seniors are doing in the greatest country in the world, we can put money in their pockets by lowering the cost of prescription drugs. They will not see much of this tax cut, but they deserve some money in their pocket, too.

If we do this right, if we use good old common sense, we can put forward a plan that keeps the economy going, puts money in people's pockets, and supports our families in a way that allows the economy to grow and prosper. We owe no less to our children.

We can do better. It is time to take a second look at what we are doing.

I yield my time.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mrs. FEINSTEIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mrs. FEINSTEIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous request to be recognized as in morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The remarks of Mrs. FEINSTEIN pertaining to the introduction of S. 976 are located in today's RECORD under "Introduction of Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

Mrs. FEINSTEIN. I thank the Chair. I yield the floor.

KOREAN WAR HEROISM

Mr. SMITH of New Hampshire. Mr. President, with the approach of Memorial Day, it is my privilege to call the attention of this body to one of the greatest, yet least known, acts of sustained heroism in the history of the United States. It occurred 50 years ago in the sixth month of the Korean war.

In December of 1950 American forces accomplished the unbelievable evacuation of 100,000 Allied troops from the port city of Hungnam in North Korea, barely hours ahead of the charging forces of our two newest enemies, North Korea and Communist China. At the same time our American soldiers, sailors, and marines, managed to evacuate another 100,000 persons, all North Korean civilian refugees who were fleeing their own harsh dictatorship and the ruthless Chinese army whose leaders had threatened to cut off their heads because some had been aiding our United Nations forces.

One of the most heroic acts in the evacuation of Hungnam is the virtually unknown story of a small American merchant marine freighter, the S.S. Meredith Victory. With space for only twelve passengers, the ship loaded and rescued 14,000 North Koreans—the innocent people of our enemy—old men, young mothers with their babies on their backs and at their breasts, children carrying children. Their rescue was accomplished during one danger-filled voyage of three days and three nights in bitter winter cold that ended in safety and freedom on Christmas Day. The United States Government, through its Maritime Administration, has called it "the greatest rescue operation by a single ship in the history of mankind."

The Korean war has been called "America's forgotten war," and the evacuation of Hungnam has been called "the forgotten battle in the forgotten war." I submit, that the heroic story of the men of the S.S. Meredith Victory is "the forgotten rescue."

Fortunately, this story is now being brought to the attention of the American people in a new book "Ship of Miracles" by Bill Gilbert, a former reporter for the Washington Post who served in the U.S. Air Force during and after the Korean war. The foreword to his book is written by General Alexander M. Haig Jr. whose career included serving as White House chief of staff, NATO commander, and Secretary of State. Appropriately, however, General Haig served in Korea during the war and was directly involved in the rescue of our troops and the refugees from Hungnam. The book was released by Triumph Books of Chicago.

General Haig states in his foreword, "The story of Hungnam and the Meredith Victory is a brilliant yet relatively unknown chapter in American history that can now take its place, during this fiftieth anniversary of the Korean war, among such legendary names as Bunker Hill, Midway, the Battle of the Bulge, Iwo Jima and Okinawa. This book did not just deserve to be written—it needed to be written."

The men of the Meredith Victory, led by their captain, Leonard LaRue of Philadelphia, emerge as the heroes of this amazing story. Every one of the 14,000 refugees aboard that ship survived, plus five babies born enroute to safety with no doctors to help. There was no food for the refugees, no water, no sanitation facilities, no interpreters, and no protection against the enemy. The men of the Meredith Victory accomplished their rescue while sailing through one of the heaviest-laid mine fields in the history of naval warfare with no mine detectors. They had no anti-aircraft guns in case of an air attack. Radio contact with other ships was forbidden for security reasons. To add to the prolonged tension, the ship was carrying a large supply of jet fuel.

The Meredith Victory arrived at Pusan on the southern tip of the Korean Peninsula on Christmas eve but was not allowed to land because the port was already overflowing with refugees and rescued American troops. Captain LaRue wrote later of "these people aboard who, like the Holy Family many centuries before, were themselves refugees from a tyrannical force." The ship did land safely on Christmas Day on Koje-Do island, fifty miles southwest of Pusan.

One of the Navy officers who participated in the Hungnam evacuation was the late Admiral Arleigh Burke who became Chief of Naval Operations. He later said, "As a result of the extraordinary efforts of the men of the Meredith Victory, many people are now free who otherwise might well be under the Communist yoke. Many unknown Koreans owe the future freedom of their children to the efforts of these men."

Larry King, the talk show host, said "Ship of Miracles" will make you proud to be an American."

The book has already won its first award. Mr. Gilbert has been awarded the Theodore Roosevelt and Franklin D. Roosevelt Naval History Prize, awarded annually by the New York Council of the Navy League. The Council's president, Rear Admiral Robert A. Ravitz (USNR, ret.), said Mr. Gilbert was selected "because his book tells a story of American heroism and humanitarianism which has gone overlooked for 50 years and should be told and made a shining part of our military history."

Admiral Ravitz added, "At a time when we are reading other stories about what American forces did or didn't do in Korea and elsewhere, Mr. Gilbert has made a valuable contribution to American history of revealing this story of both the bravery and the goodness of America's men in time of war."

For these reasons, our nation owes a debt to Bill Gilbert on this Memorial Day for writing a book which reminds the American people of that forgotten war and of an heroic incident in that war by the brave men of the S.S. Meredith Victory.

IN RECOGNITION OF OLDER AMERICANS MONTH

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I rise today in recognition of "Older Americans Month." Since 1963 when President Kennedy began this important tradition, each May has been designated as a time for our country to honor our older citizens for their many accomplishments and contributions to our Nation. Those of us who have worked diligently in the U.S. Senate to ensure that older Americans are able to live in dignity and independence during their later years look forward to this opportunity to pause and reflect on the contributions of those individuals who have played such a major role in the shaping of our great Nation. We honor them for their hard work and the countless sacrifices they have made throughout their lifetimes, and look forward to their continued contributions to our country's welfare.

Today's older citizens have witnessed more technological advances than any other generation in our Nation's history. Seniors today have lived through times of extreme economic depression and prosperity, times of war and peace, and incredible advancements in the fields of science, medicine, transportation and communications. They have adapted to these changes remarkably well while continuing to make meaningful contributions to this country.

Recent Census figures reveal that the number of Americans 85 and older grew 37 percent during the 1990's while the nation's overall population increased only 13 percent. Baby boomers, who represented one-third of all Americans in 1994, will enter the 65-years-and-older category over the next 13-34 years, substantially increasing this segment of our population.

At the same time the number of older Americans is skyrocketing, they are in much better health and far less likely than their counterparts of previous generations to be impoverished, disabled or living in nursing homes. More older Americans are working and volunteering far beyond the traditional retirement age to give younger generations the benefit of their wisdom. These figures show that commitment to programs such as Medicare and Social Security, and investment in biomedical research and treatment are improving the quality of life for older Americans. One of our national goals must be to ensure all older Americans experience these improvements. We must continue to enact meaningful legislation to help meet the needs of this valuable and constantly expanding segment of our society.

By 2020, Medicare will be responsible for covering nearly 20 percent of the population. Yet 3 in 5 Medicare beneficiaries lack affordable, prescription drug coverage. Though Medicare works, it was created in a different time before the benefits of prescription medicines had become such an integral part of health care. Today it is unthinkable to think of quality healthcare coverage without including the medicines that treat and prevent illnesses. I have and will continue to fight for Medicare prescription drug coverage. As a cosponsor of the Medicare Prescription Drug Coverage Act of 2001, I recognize the predicament many older Americans are in as they struggle to live independently on a fixed income and afford costly prescription drugs. It is imperative that we address the needs of the Americans who have devoted so much of their life experience and achievement to better our society.

The celebration of Older Americans Month provides us with the opportunity to highlight the importance of the Older Americans Act. As a vigorous and consistent supporter of measures to benefit older Americans, I am pleased that Congress and President Clinton reauthorized this important legislation last year. I commend my colleague from Maryland, Senator BARBARA MIKULSKI, for her tireless efforts in pressing for enactment of The Older Americans Act Amendments of 2000. This legislation funds a dynamic network of community and home-based services so critical to many of our Nation's seniors, including home care, ombudsman services for residents in long-term care facilities, and subsidized employment for older workers.

One of the most beneficial provisions of the Act is the creation of the National Family Caregiver Support Program. The Administration on Aging estimates that each day, as many as 5 million older Americans are recipients of care from more than 22 million informal caregivers. On average, these caregivers will limit their professional opportunities and lose an average of $550,000 in total wage wealth as they care for their loved ones. Women are 50 percent more likely to be informal caregivers, and as a result, they are more likely to risk their health, earnings and retirement security. As programs such as Medicare and Medicaid continue to feel the pressures of the current Federal budget process, the noble and compassionate work of these dedicated individuals is particularly critical. The National Family Caregiver Support Program addresses the challenges faced by informal caregivers. It authorizes funding for distribution of information to caregivers regarding available services, caregiver training, and respite services to provide families temporary relief from caregiving responsibilities.

I have always believed strongly that this wise population contributes greatly to American society. Our Nation's older generations are an ever-growing resource that deserves our attention, our gratitude, and our heart-felt respect. As observance of Older American Month comes to a close, I look forward to working with my colleagues in the Senate to implement public policies that affirm the contributions of older Americans to our society and ensure that they continue to thrive with dignity.

LOCAL LAW ENFORCEMENT ACT OF 2001

Mr. SMITH of Oregon. Mr. President, I rise today to speak about hate crimes legislation I introduced with Senator KENNEDY last month. The Local Law Enforcement Act of 2001 would add new categories to current hate crimes legislation sending a signal that violence of any kind is unacceptable in our society.

I would like to describe a heinous crime that occurred November 7, 1999 in Lawrence, KS. Two heterosexual men, one a student at Kansas University, were walking down the street when some men directed anti-gay epithets at them. After responding to the remarks, the two were attacked by five men. One of the victims was knocked backwards on a concrete planter and held down while two attackers struck his face with their fists. The other ran to call the police. This was the third such incident in as many months. One of the victims said that the police initially told him they could not arrest the perpetrators because, "it was their word against ours."

I believe that government's first duty is to defend its citizens, to defend them against the harms that come out of hate. The Local Law Enforcement Enhancement Act of 2001 is now a symbol that can become substance. I believe that by passing this legislation, we can change hearts and minds as well.

ROLE OF THE FEDERAL OMBUDSMEN IN DISPUTE RESOLUTION

Mr. AKAKA. Mr. President, last week the General Accounting Office, GAO, released a report I requested entitled "Human Capital: The Role of Ombudsmen in Dispute Resolution." The report studies the use of Federal ombudsman offices as an informal alternative to existing and more conventional processes to deal with personnel conflicts inside Federal agencies.

I know that traditional formal dispute resolution processes have long been criticized. To address these concerns, the Federal Government promotes and encourages alternative methods including the use of ombudsmen. This has resulted in the greater use of alternative dispute resolution, ADR, practices, both because of legislation, specifically the Administrative Dispute Resolution Act of 1990, ADRA, and because of a desire to resolve workplaces conflicts quickly to the mutual benefit of both the employee and the agency. I wish to point out that ombudsmen are not themselves an alternative means of dispute resolution, but rather a neutral practitioner of dispute resolution practices, including ADR techniques, to handle complaints.

I support strong workplace protections to protect Federal employees from arbitrary agency actions and prohibited personnel practices. Ombudsmen provide another way to ensure a more rapid conclusion to workplace problems. These offices may also provide another tool in assisting agencies in attracting, retaining, and motivating their workforces. In fact, this report concludes that "ombudsman offices can offer a useful option for agencies to consider in developing their overall human capital management policies and practices." Another plus is that these offices focus on identifying systemic issues and developing conflict prevention strategies.

The GAO identified 22 workplace ombudsman offices in 10 agencies. Their "best practices" report focuses for illustrative purposes on offices within three agencies: The National Institutes of Health, NIH, the International Broadcasting Bureau, IBB, and the U.S. Secret Service.

NIH has one of the most developed ombudsman offices, which was established in 1997, and now has four full time ombudsman. The IBB office began as a part-time position in 1988, and now has two full-time officials. The Secret Service's office, started in 1987, employs one full-time staff member and nine collateral-duty people serving the Secret Service's field offices.

These ombudsmen are high-level managers with broad authority to deal with almost any workplace issue, including answering questions about agency policies, cutting through "red tape," counseling employees and coaching them on how to manage situations, handling accusations about employment discrimination, and workplace safety issues. Ombudsmen are a resource for Federal workers with workplace issues; an office which they can consult that is independent, neutral, and provides confidentiality.

The 1990 ADRA authorizes the use of ombudsman offices but does not define or set standards for an ombudsman. The Act, as amended in 1996, established the Interagency ADR Working Group. There is also a Coalition of Federal Ombudsmen. The NIH, IBB, and Secret Service ombudsmen who participated in the GAO report are involved with both these and outside organizations. Some of the non-Federal Government organizations have published or drafted standards of practice for ombudsmen. These standards focus on the core principals of independence, neutrality, and confidentiality, which requires a commitment from the highest levels within an agency. This commitment is the guiding force in the success of the three offices studied by the GAO.

In addition to support from senior management, an ombudsman office must work closely with unions representing Federal workers. The General Counsel of the Federal Labor Relations Authority has issued guidance concerning the establishment of ADR programs and the Federal Service

Labor-Management Relations Statute. It is essential that ombudsmen do not come in conflict with the role of unions in protecting worker rights. From the case studies examined by the GAO, there appeared to be good relations between ombudsmen and unions in the agencies where employees are represented by unions. As agencies consider this and other alternatives to traditional dispute resolution, there must be assurances that employees' rights are maintained throughout the process of implementing these practices.

I recommend this General Accounting Office report to my colleagues, and I commend Anthony P. Lofaro of the GAO for his contribution to this report, along with Stephen Altman and Katherine Brentzel. It provides excellent background and a best practices blueprint for Federal agencies as they consider employing ombudsman to assist their employees.

AMERICAN INDIAN HERITAGE MONTH

Mr. WELLSTONE. Mr. President, I rise today to speak on American Indian Heritage Month, which is celebrated in Minnesota in May. It is fitting that we take time during this month to recall the contributions, services and heritage of our fellow Native American citizens, and to remember that the enormous contributions and talents of Native American continue to enrich our lives every day.

In our review of these vital contributions, we must acknowledge the courage, talent, determination, leadership and vision of those men, women and children who made an impact on our Nation in the face of incredible obstacles. We should be mindful, as we celebrate the culture, heritage and spiritual contributions of the first Americans, that we must re-dedicate ourselves to preserving the unique relationship between Native Americans tribal governments and the Federal Government.

Many of the basic principles of our Constitution, such as freedom of speech and separation of powers, were embodied in practices already in use by American Indian tribal prior to our Republic. Many of our deepest values, such as respect for the preservation of natural resources, reverence for elders, and adherence to tradition, find root in American Indian traditions.

The relationship between American Indians and the Federal Government is unique and finds no parallel. When the United States was organized as a Nation, government officials continued the practice from the Dutch and British of making treaty agreements with American Indian Nations whenever land boundaries needed to be clarified or negotiated.

All of the land in Minnesota was gained by the United States through a series of treaties with the Anishinabe and Dakota Nations. Sixteen treaties and four agreements applied to American Indians of Minnesota. One of the earliest treaties to affect Minnesota's American Indians was the Pike Treaty of 1806, which allowed the Federal Government to claim a small section of land near the confluence of the Minnesota and Mississippi rivers to build a military fort, which ultimately became known as Fort Snelling. The 1825 Treaty of Prairie du Chien created a boundary between the Dakota to the south and the Ojibwe who lived in the woodland country to the north.

In addition to acknowledging the historical context of the relationship between the Federal Government and the American Indians, we should also recognize the various contemporary entities and contributions of these Bands. Their efforts have helped shape the social, economic and political landscape of our region.

In the area of economic development, the Minnesota American Indian Chamber of Commerce has done tremendous work in the area of advanced telecommunications, and other forms of business development to expand economic opportunities for American Indians on reservations as well as in urban areas.

The Mille Lacs Band of Ojibwe was honored by the Harvard Project on American Indian Innovation in 1999 for their Ojibwe Language Program. This is a highly successful effort to revitalize the Band's native language by teaching it to their younger members in innovative ways.

Our community also is extremely privileged to have an organization with the capacity and outreach of American Indian Opportunities Industrialization Center. This organization provides necessary education and job training skills, serving as a bridge between public school and employment or college for its students.

I am also proud to commend the organizations that comprise the Metropolitan Urban Indian Directors for their unwavering efforts to examine and address many critical issues and challenges facing urban American Indians.

Native Americans in my State, and indeed in all fifty States, are justly proud of their heritage and culture. They can be just as proud of their efforts today to preserve that heritage, to protect that culture and to make it relevant for today's Native American children, and it is those efforts that I honor today.

CONFIRMATION OF RESERVE SERVICE CHIEFS

Mr. McCain. Mr. President, I rise to mark an historic day for our Nation's military, and specifically the reserves. Yesterday, the U.S. Senate honorably carried out its constitutional duty by approving the Presidential nominations of Reserve Service Chiefs to the rank of three-star. Last year's National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2001, H.R. 4205, required the service secretaries to increase the rank of the Chief of the Navy Reserve, Commander of the Marine Forces Reserve, Chief of the Army Reserve, Chief of the Air Force Reserve, Director of the Army National Guard, and the Director of the Air National Guard to Vice Admiral or Lieutenant General. This mandate was very significant to me and many of my colleagues, as well as those who serve in our reserve forces.

Earlier this year, I was greatly honored to be recognized by the Reserve Officers Association in receiving their highest honor—the Minute Man of the Year Award. The Reserve Officers Association, particularly Rear Admiral Stephen G. Yusem USNR (Retired), deserves great credit for its efforts in working with Congress to ensure that this well-deserved change in promotion authority for the Reserve Chiefs became a reality.

It is especially important to me because of the significant changes I have observed in our Total Force, active duty and Reserve Components since the late-1980s to early-1990s when Senator Glenn chaired the Personnel Subcommittee on the Committee on Armed Services and I was the ranking member on the subcommittee. Back then, reservists were truly weekend warriors. That, however, is not the case now—they are much more than that. Today, reservists work considerably more than weekends, and are as critical a part of the fabric of our National Military Strategy as active duty servicemembers.

The all-volunteer military has largely been a success in our country. However, an unfortunate bi-product has been the increasing chasm between those Americans who have served in the armed services and those who have not. Twenty years ago, scores of elected officials in Washington were veterans. Today, the number of Senators and Congressmen who have worn the uniform of the armed services has rapidly declined.

This military-civilian gap, as some have characterized it, is a troubling reality that we must seek to bridge. It is increasingly difficult for many of our fellow citizens to truly appreciate the sacrifices of those who serve in any capacity. That is another reason that the reserves are so important for our national life. Our reserve servicemembers not only protect our liberty, but also serve as the indispensable link to those Americans in civilian life not ordinarily touched in their daily lives by the sacrifice, honor and privilege of military service.

The roles and missions of the Reserve Components have changed over the past several years, as the active duty force has evolved from the downsizing of our military forces during the last decade. For example, in March 2001, the Army National Guard 29th Infantry Division took command of the American peacekeeping mission in Bosnia. The significance of this deployment is that 75 percent of the 4,000 U.S. Army soldiers on the ground will be Army Reserve and Guard soldiers from 17 states—not just headquarters' staff, but operational units as well.

This is just one of many such deployments that have taken place in recent years, but it highlights the ever-increasing role of reservists in defending America's security interests around the world, and marks a radical departure from the past.

The figures are quite staggering when considered in total. Today, reservists and National Guardsmen are deployed under three presidential call-up orders for Bosnia, Kosovo and Southwest Asia. For Bosnia, more than 21,000 U.S. reservists have been called involuntarily since 1995, with another 14,000 having served in a voluntary capacity. For Kosovo, more than 7,100 have been called involuntarily, and these have been joined by more than 4,000 volunteers. For Southwest Asia, 2,800 have been called and some 11,000 have volunteered.

During each of the past five years, Reserve and National Guard servicemembers have performed between 12 and 13.5 million duty days in support of the active force. These numbers are a direct contrast to 1990, when just one million duty days were performed, yet there were 25 percent more reservists.

Reservists also currently make up more than half of the airlift crews and 85 percent of the sealift personnel needed to move troops and equipment in either wartime or peacetime operations. In addition, reserve medical and construction battalions, as well as other specialists, are critical to a wide range of operations. Consequently, efforts by the reserve components to move beyond a traditional wartime backup role and to provide peacetime support to active units are desirable. The Naval Reserve and Air Force Reserve components have made particularly impressive progress in this direction.

Reservists are performing many vital tasks, from patrolling the no-fly zones in skies above Iraq to rebuilding schools in hurricane-stricken Honduras and fighting fires in our western states, from overseeing civil affairs in Bosnia, to augmenting aircraft carriers short on active duty sailors with critical skilled enlisted ratings during at-sea exercises as well as periods of deployment.

I believe that the civilian and uniformed leadership of our Armed Forces and the Congress must recognize this involvement, and, at a minimum, provide equality in benefits for reserve component servicemembers when they put on the uniform and perform their weekend drills as well as all other critical training evolutions. Quality of life is not just an active duty obligation that Congress must provide. Reservists, on duty, who resemble their active duty counterparts during training evolutions and are deployed at times around the world, should be treated equally when the administration and Congress provide for quality of life benefits.

I am pleased to pay homage to the many wonderful reserve servicemen and women who serve in our armed forces, and in some small measure thank them for their dedicated service to our country by recognizing the confirmation by the U.S. Senate of the Reserve Service Chiefs to three-star rank. Congratulations to Vice Admiral John B. Totushek, Chief of the Naval Reserve; Lieutenant General Dennis M. McCarthy, Commander of the Marine Forces Reserve; Lieutenant General Thomas J. Plewes, Chief of the Army Reserve; Lieutenant General James E. Sherrard, III, Chief of the Air Force Reserve; and, Lieutenant General Roger C. Schultz, Director of the Army National Guard. I am confident that our Reserve Component forces will continue to flourish under your leadership. All of you have already demonstrated that the key to your strength as leaders is in supporting the servicemen and women who work very hard in our military. I trust in your willingness and ability to uphold the honor of our country. Congratulations on your continued sacrifice and service to our Nation.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

IN RECOGNITION OF THERMOANALYTICS, INC.

• Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I wish to acknowledge the achievements of ThermoAnalytics, Inc., a small business from my home state of Michigan that has been once again recognized for its quality products and high tech innovation. On May 9 of this year, ThermoAnalytics was selected by the Small Business Administration as the Small Business Prime Contractor of the Year 2000 for Region V, an area that includes Michigan, Illinois, Indiana, Minnesota, Ohio and Wisconsin. This is the third quality award bestowed upon ThermoAnalytics, Inc. by the Federal Government in the past year.

ThermoAnalytics has worked with the automotive industry and the U.S. Army Tank-Automotive and Armaments Command (TACOM) to develop a world class software tool that is considered standard in the auto industry and Department of the Army. As the Army continues to transform itself into a smaller, lighter and more efficient fighting force, computer analysis tools, such as these, are used to design performance vehicles before they are built and tested. The products designed by ThermoAnalytics are helping the Army achieve this important goal.

ThermoAnalytics developed a computerized model for heat management to aid in the assessment of the susceptibility of Army vehicles to threat sensors. This technology was commercialized into a state-of-the-art image based radiation solver. The commercial product was released in July 1999 and provides engineers with a quick and simple thermal predication tool. A second commercial product was developed for more advanced use by the Big 3 automotive manufacturers and associated automotive markets. The products are used widely by the automotive industry and military labs and contractors.

In addition to the Contractor of the Year Award, ThermoAnalytics received the Small Business Administration's Tibbetts Award for their accomplishments in the area of high technology innovation on October 3, 2000. Tibbetts Awards are presented annually to small technology firms which have achieved excellence under the Small Business Innovative Research (SBIR) program. The winners, one from each state, are selected based on the economic impact of the technological innovation, overall business achievement and demonstration of effective collaborations.

Prior to the Contractor of the Year Award and the Tibbetts Award, ThermoAnalytics received the Army Phase II Quality Award on August 22, 2000. These three awards highlight the ingenuity and innovation that have come to typify ThermoAnalytics.

ThermoAnalytics, Inc. is an outstanding company that has played a vital role in assisting the United States Army and private industry. I know that my Senate Colleagues will join me in congratulating ThermoAnalytics on being named the Small Business Prime Contractor of the Year for Region V.●

MEMORIAL DAY TRIBUTE

• Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, in celebration of the Memorial Day holiday, I would like to recognize the work of Gertrude Stephenson, whose dedication to the remembrance of veterans has led to deeper awareness and ongoing appreciation of fallen heroes in Washington County, IN. What began as a project of the Salem High School Class of 1965 to honor Jerry Sabens, killed in Vietnam, developed into a community-wide effort to acknowledge the sacrifices of all Washington County veterans who gave their lives in service to our country.

Thanks to Mrs. Stephenson's direction and the research assistance of Martha Bowers, more than 100 articles were printed in The Salem Leader detailing the stories of these veterans. With the help of Cecil Smith, former editor of The Salem Leader, and his staff, the stories have been compiled in a book, "Gone But Not Forgotten."

This labor of justice will greatly benefit the citizens of Washington County, IN, as families come together to share stories, photographs and personal information of the loved ones who died protecting our freedom. County youth will gain new understanding and appreciation of our American patriots of war.

I am personally grateful for all in Washington County who contributed to this project, including the Washington County Veterans Office, the County Extension Office, the Stevens Museum staff and so many others.●

TRIBUTE TO ELIZABETH M. BENNETT

• Mr. DAYTON. Mr. President, today I take the opportunity to pay special tribute to a remarkable person, Elizabeth M. Bennett, of Wayzata, MN. Beth has led a life of extraordinary service to the communities of Minneapolis and Saint Paul. Most particularly, she has invested her energies with the goal of improving the quality of health care in the Twin Cities. Her activism was not limited to Minnesota, however; early on, she also made her presence felt in Northern California, where she lived for a time, and eventually on the national stage, as well.

The extensive list of her volunteer commitments spans six decades, beginning with her activism in high school, where she applied her special gifts for analysis and problem solving. Happily, these talents were also crowned by the ability to lead and inspire, for, in a demonstration of her early promise, she started a YWCA leadership group at West High School in Minneapolis. For this effort, she was awarded the Harry S. Truman National Leadership Award in 1947. From there, Beth was well on her way.

As a young person, Beth dreamt of entering the medical profession, an ambition which was never realized. Instead, she directed her passion for better health care into her volunteer work, serving as a board member for a variety of institutions. She volunteered to participate—early, effectively, and equipped always by mastery of the subject at hand—in the public discussion encompassing the community's broad health care agendas. Her interests have included the uninsured, and health care research for children and seniors, always staying current with the rapidly changing profile of health care needs and delivery systems in our society.

In addition to investing her time, heart, and mind, she raised many millions of dollars. For her extraordinary fund raising, she has not always received sufficient recognition. But I am pleased to say that in 1988, she was awarded the well-deserved National Association of Fundraisers Award. Beyond the tangible, however, Beth touches others with that indispensable, inimitable spirit of enthusiasm, encouraging them to become involved, too. Many have found exposure to Beth's zeal and breadth of knowledge about a cause to be irresistible and have been moved to strong support, sometimes for the first time.

Beth was instrumental in the creation of the new Children's Hospital in 1958, planning for community health care facilities and programs, consideration of issues in medical education, and the relationship between the University and private community entities and served on its Board for 35 years.

She served on the boards of Northwestern Hospital and Abbott Hospital in various capacities and was a major force in their merger in 1994, serving for over 40 years. She acted as a liaison between Abbott-Northwestern and Children's (now Allina Health System) during a crucial early period, planning for community health care facilities for adults as well as children.

Continuing her lifelong advocacy of quality health care for the citizens of the State of Minnesota, Beth has been a member since 1990 of the board of directors of the University of Minnesota's Children's Foundation (which supports pediatric research), recently as its Chair, and concurrently chairs the pediatric portion of Campaign Minnesota at the University of Minnesota.

In recognition of these numerous contributions she has made to health care, Beth was recently recognized with the University of Minnesota Dean of the Medical School Community Service Award.

While health care is closest to Beth's heart, she is also dedicated to higher education, having served on the boards of the University of Saint Thomas for the last 7 years and the Minneapolis College of Art and Design. In addition, she has served as a board member of WAMSO (Women's Association of Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra), the United Way, and The Bakken Library. Her love of the arts also inspired her to serve as a docent of the Minneapolis Institute of Arts. Long a member of the Junior League of Minneapolis, she spent 15 years on its board of directors and also chaired its Prevention of Accidental Poisoning in Children Project. While residing in California in the 1950's, she belonged to the board of directors of the Children's Hospital of the East Bay in Oakland and volunteered at the Oakland Well Baby Clinic.

Those who are fortunate enough to know Beth called her a jewel. To legions, she has been a champion, having created a solid legacy of support for many institutions and their constituents. While I trust that Beth's vocation of service has truly been its own reward, I hope that my remarks today might reflect a small measure of the goodness, self-giving, and strength she has long brought to us Minnesotans. ●

FLORIDA BOARD OF REGENTS

● Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. President, I rise today to commend the Florida Voters League for its efforts to save Florida's Board of Regents. Today, the Board of Regents meet for the last time as the chief governing body of our State university system. The individuals who have served our system through the years have been distinguished public servants. I want to recognize them and thank them for their tireless effort throughout the years to ensure our students receive a quality education.

Florida's system has faced many challenges over the years, but none have been as potentially destructive as abolishing the board. At a time when Florida faces increasing strains on colleges and universities, it is imperative that we maintain a system that ensures our higher educational institutions receive adequate resources and funding beyond politics. The Board of Regents was created for that very purpose. It has served our State well by ensuring no State university becomes too powerful at the expense of the others.

This new system ensures that politicians will govern education, instead of experts and independent voices. In the past, the word of the Board of Regents was respected by legislators and was further supported by the Governor. It was meant to be a nonpartisan governing board. The will of the Universities now, however, will be determined by local political boards and the will of the Legislature. We recently have seen programs granted to universities by legislators, despite the strong opposition of the Board of Regents largely because legislators wanted to bring home "the bacon" to their alma mater. It was best described by Dean Weisenfeld of Florida Atlantic University's College of Science when he stated, we need to let "universities be universities." Instead, the fate of our universities might now depend on the strength of their legislative delegations.

As my distinguished colleague, Senator BOB GRAHAM, has argued, elimination of the Board returns our State to an antiquated system under which our institutions are pitted against each other for State and Federal dollars. The Board of Regents, on the other hand, has fostered a system of cooperation between our colleges and universities, reduced duplication of programs, and ensured fairness in funding. We must continue that spirit of cooperation if we are to meet the needs of our institutions and achieve our ultimate goals: creating world-class programs, attracting quality faculty and students and ensuring our schools can compete with the nation's best for research dollars. In that spirit, I support Senator GRAHAM's efforts to preserve the Board via constitutional referendum.

I applaud the Florida Voter League and other organizations that have chosen to speak out on this important issue. Insuring our State's next generation of leaders receive a quality college education is an issue we can't afford to ignore. ●

IN RECOGNITION OF SUGARBUSH ELEMENTARY SCHOOL, 1ST PLACE WINNER IN THE NATIONAL CHILDREN'S SET A GOOD EXAMPLE COMPETITION

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I would like to honor the students at Sugarbush Elementary School, in my home state of Michigan. These motivated students will be honored on June 6th of this year for winning first place in the 18th Annual American Set A Good Example Competition.

Too often we hear about all the negative influences facing our youth. Much has been made of the many problems facing our children. While we hear about the threats posed by drugs, violence and illiteracy, too little is made of the positive steps that our youth are making to fight these terrible problems. This year, students from thousands of schools participated in the National Children's Set A Good Example Competition in an effort to address these problems. This competition is an innovative program that takes students' ideas seriously, and encourages them to develop and design projects that combat problems facing them every day.

Everybody truly wins when children are given the chance to express themselves and improve their communities, but the students at Sugarbush Elementary School received special notice when they were awarded 1st place in the National Children's Set a Good Example Competition. Their project encourages children to avoid drugs, respect people and protect the environment—values that people of all ages should live by.

Winning first place in a contest that includes over 10,000 schools is a significant accomplishment, and the students, faculty and parents at Sugarbush Elementary School have every reason to be proud of this accomplishment. I am sure that my Senate colleagues will join me in honoring the students at Sugarbush Elementary School for Winning 1st place in the National Children's Set a Good Example Competition, and more importantly for their hard work, idealism and commitment to strong values.●

TRIBUTE TO THE LIFE OF JULIAN JAY HENDRICKS

● Mr. REID. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senator ENSIGN, I rise today to pay tribute to a young Nevadan who touched the lives of those around him and created a sense of family in the small one-room schoolhouse where he was a student.

Julian Jay Hendricks, who celebrated his 7th birthday on February 25, 2001, became a student in the Duckwater Elementary School one-room schoolhouse last fall, and quickly adapted to life in the 9 student community. Julian's contagious smile and joyful disposition became a welcome presence to his Duckwater classmates and teacher.

Inside the classroom, Julian was an excellent math student, and enjoyed the task of learning how to read. On the playground, the young boy enthusiastically played basketball and volleyball with his friends and classmates. Like many adventurous boys, he loved skateboarding and rollerblading with his friends. Another favorite pastime of his was challenging his friends to a game of checkers; a game he was almost always the victor!

Tragically, Julian's life and the life of his grandmother, Jeanette Lankford, were cut short in an automobile accident on March 4, 2001.

For too short a time, this young Nevadan brought great happiness and friendship into a tiny schoolhouse in rural Duckwater, Nevada. We rise today to offer this tribute to Julian's life not only on our behalf, but on behalf of his teacher, Lynn Anderson, and all his friends and classmates at Duckwater Elementary School.

In conclusion, I submit to the RECORD a poem written in memory of Julian by his friend Amber Hoy.

I really didn't know Julian too well, but his beautiful smile that stretched across his rosy chubby cheeks was quite contagious to all of us.

I knew him just well enough to know he enjoyed his life and all of the wonders in it.

I am just deeply disappointed that I didn't get to know him as well as I would like to.

I find myself selfishly wishing Julian was back here with us now,

Although we think of his death as a tragedy, Julian's future is much brighter in heaven with Jesus than it ever would have been here on Earth.

It was God's will to take Julian to a wonderful place where he can live the rest of his life safe in peace.

Secretly I ask myself what would Julian have been like in ten or maybe twenty years from now?

But I believe he will always be the small friendly boy, who attended the small friendly Duckwater School.

Even though Julian's body is gone, his spirit lives on in our hearts and the joyful sound of his happy laugh will forever ring in our ears.

At first I wished that I would have gotten to say good-bye to Julian, but maybe that last unforgettable smile and the last slight wave of his little hand as he stepped off the bus; was good-bye.

Good-bye, Julian. . .

Julian will always be in our thoughts and prayers.

Love always, Amber Hoy.

I add the thoughts and prayers of myself and Senator ENSIGN to those of Amber Hoy. Julian and his grandmother will be missed.●

WESTPORT VOLUNTEER EMERGENCY MEDICAL SERVICE

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I rise today to commend the Westport Volunteer Emergency Medical Service. Next week, the Westport Volunteer EMS will receive the EMS Magazine "Gold Award" in recognition of the extraordinary vision, professionalism, and dedication of Westport's volunteer emergency medical service providers.

By awarding WVEMS the "Gold Award," EMS Magazine is confirming what many of us have long known: community spirit is alive and well in Connecticut and it still changes lives for the better. The men and women of the Westport Volunteer EMS are true heroes—not only because they save lives—but because they are willing to do the yeomen's work that must be done to ensure that our communities are prepared to respond when the unthinkable happens.

More than 120 Westport volunteers respond to more than 2,000 9-1-1 calls each year. These volunteers make a huge difference in the lives of their fellow citizens. They respond to emergencies night and day. They provide comfort and assistance to people in distress and they save lives. But they also make an enormous difference in less dramatic ways. They teach safety and emergency preparedness classes to hundreds of school-aged children and adults. They host conferences. And nearly every weekend, somewhere in the community a volunteer EMS team provides coverage at a local school athletic event or community gathering. This is the true essence of community spirit—the willingness to spend time working with your neighbors to protect and service the greater good.

The Westport EMS was formally incorporated in 1979 and continues to serve the community as a division within the Westport Police Department, with on-site, standby crews 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, 52 weeks a year. Last year, Westport's volunteers logged 26,000 hours of community service.

The entire Northeast region recently had a chance to see the Westport EMS at work when Westport hosted a regional disaster drill in the form of a simulated Amtrak train wreck at the Westport train station. More than 400 EMS, fire, police, railroad, and National Guard personnel were joined by State officials in a realistic and successful event.

Recently, the Westport Volunteer Emergency Medical Service program was presented the "Connecticut Treasures" award in recognition of the agency's 20 years of service to the community. This same service and dedication are examples of one of America's greatest treasures—the goodness and charity of the American people. I commend the Westport EMS volunteers for their extraordinary service to their fellow citizens, and I congratulate them on receiving this much-deserved honor.●

TRIBUTE TO FRED HOLT

● Mr. FEINGOLD. Mr. President, a great educator and a dear friend of my family died earlier this month. Fred R. Holt was a school superintendent in my hometown of Janesville, Wisconsin from 1959 to 1978, and as the Janesville Gazette noted, his influence will echo in Janesville classrooms for years.

He oversaw the Janesville school system during one of its most challenging times, when the baby boom generation was rapidly increasing the school population. His gifted leadership helped to foster a climate that was supportive of students and teachers alike. As Fred's secretary for many years, Carol Smith, said, he cared for everyone on his staff as well as the students, and always did his best for them.

Fred was deeply committed to our schools. He attended school in Janesville, and was a teacher himself, in Edgerton, Wisconsin and in other districts before becoming Janesville's superintendent, and he knew how valuable a good teacher is. As a Janesville Gazette article recalled, Fred would send his administrators to teacher-training institutions across the Midwest to recruit top teaching prospects. As products of Fred Holt's Janesville schools, my brother, sisters, and I can attest to the success of his efforts. Thousands of Janesville families were the beneficiaries of Fred Holt's foresight and initiative.

I had the privilege of working with Fred after he retired when I served in the Wisconsin State Senate. He was an enormously effective advocate, and generously shared his time counseling troubled youth, heading a volunteer service bureau, and helping to renovate the Janesville Senior Center. In 1987, his work was recognized when he was named one of Wisconsin's 10 admired seniors.

Fred Holt's legacy is evident in Janesville and across the country. I am a part of that legacy. And so are tens of thousands of business people and auto workers, physicians and police officers, artists and plumbers, educators, machinists, farmers, and others who have become who they are in large part because of the education they received growing up in Janesville. We owe him an enormous debt.●

IN MEMORY OF RABBI YITSCHAK MEIR KAGAN

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, Today I would like to commemorate the achievements of a beloved religious leader, dedicated father and husband and friend from my home state of Michigan, Rabbi Yitschak Meir Kagan. On June 3 of this year, people from around the world will be gathering in Southfield, MI, to honor the life and memory of Rabbi Kagan.

Through hard work and an unwavering commitment to the ideals of Chabad-Lubavitch, Rabbi Kagan's work has made an indelible mark upon countless individuals. His deep faith, keen intellect, and concern for others has led him to give generously of himself.

Born in England, Rabbi Kagan's extensive education assumed an international flavor. After early instruction in Great Britain, he studied at the Lubavitch Yeshiva in Israel, the Central Lubavitch Academy in New York and the Rabbinical College in Montreal where he received his ordination.

Central to Rabbi Kagan's life was the Chabad-Lubavitch movement. In 1966, Rabbi Kagan joined the Michigan Chabad-Lubavitch. For thirty-five years he worked tirelessly to expand the Lubavitch Foundation's presence in Michigan. Chabad-Lubavitch is a Hasidic sect that originated in Lubavitch, Russia. Lubavitch means "brotherly love," and Chabad is an acronym for a philosophy that pursues wisdom, understanding and knowledge of God. Rabbi Kagan's life embodied the ideal of brotherly love as he sought "to increase the knowledge of Judaism within every Jew" by educating people about the Torah, providing worship services and performing charitable acts.

As Associate Director of the Lubavitch Foundation, Rabbi Kagan expanded the Foundation by establishing Chabad houses in Ann Arbor, Flint and Grand Rapids, developing "the Campus of Living Judaism;" counseling students and tending to the spiritual development of countless individuals.

Rabbi Kagan's work reached far beyond Michigan. The printed word enabled his thoughts and insights to span the globe. He published essays adapted from the works of Lubavitcher Rebbe that were read by a multitude each month. In addition, he edited and translated the Rebbe's classic text, Hayom Yom, edited philosophical texts and translated commentaries on the Torah.

Rabbi Kagan has been a community and spiritual leader for over three decades. I have been able to witness, firsthand, his enthusiastic commitment to helping others in need. Rabbi Kagan touched the lives of all who met him. He worked with and helped immigrants, prisoners, drug users, families in need and others with characteristic zeal, kindness and love. I know my Senate colleagues join me in commemorating the life of Rabbi Yitschak Meir Kagan, and in offering their condolences to Rochel Kagan, his wife, and his extended family.●

As in executive session the Presiding Officer laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

REPORT ON THE PROGRESS TOWARD ACHIEVING BENCHMARKS IN BOSNIA—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 25

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report; which was referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

To the Congress of the United States:

As required by the Levin Amendment to the 1998 Supplemental Appropriations and Rescissions Act (section 7(b) of Public Law 105-174) and section 1203(a) of the Strom Thurmond National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1999 (Public Law 105-261), I transmit herewith a report on progress made toward achieving benchmarks for a sustainable peace process in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

In July 2000, the fourth semiannual report was sent to the Congress detailing progress towards achieving the ten benchmarks that were adopted by the Peace Implementation Council and the North Atlantic Council in order to evaluate implementation of the Dayton Accords. This fifth report, which also includes supplemental reporting as required by section 1203(a) of Public Law 105-261, provides an updated assessment of progress on the benchmarks covering the period July 1, 2000, to February 28, 2001.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The following petitions and memorials were laid before the Senate and were referred or ordered to lie on the table as indicated:

POM-73. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Nevada relative to the approval of national monuments; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION NO. 2

Whereas, The provisions of 16 U.S.C. §§ 431, 432, and 433, commonly referred to as the Antiquities Act of 1906, authorize the President of the United States to designate national monuments without the approval of Congress or any state or local government in which the national monument is located; and

Whereas, As part of designating a national monument pursuant to those provisions, the President of the United States may reserve parcels of public land to ensure the appropriate care and management of the national monument, and the reservation of that public land must be confined to the smallest area compatible with that care and management; and

Whereas, The designation of a national monument is often a subject of controversy

because the public lands that are included within the designation are withdrawn from the public domain, thereby restricting activities such as mining, ranching and recreation which provide an economic benefit to state and local governments in which the national monument is located; and

Whereas, Decisions concerning the use and management of public lands within a state should be decided by the residents of that state acting through their state and local representatives; and

Whereas, The unilateral designation of a national monument by the President of the United States does not create beneficial partnerships between states and the Federal Government concerning the management of public lands within those states, instead, such a designation serves to create enmity and to limit the ability of a state to manage its water resources and the ability of state and local governments to develop plans for conservation or otherwise participate in managing those public lands; now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of Nevada, Jointly, That the Legislature of the State of Nevada hereby opposes the designation of a national monument by the President of the United States without obtaining the approval of each state and local government in which the national monument is located; and be it further

Resolved, That the President of the United States is hereby urged to refrain from designating a national monument or from withdrawing public lands from the public domain to create a national monument without obtaining such approval; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate prepare and transmit a copy of this resolution to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States as the presiding officer of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives and each member of the Nevada Congressional Delegation; and be it further

Resolved, That this resolution becomes effective upon passage.

POM-74. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Nevada relative to the delegation of a National Historic Trail; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION NO. 14

Whereas, The Old Spanish Trail, which ran between Santa Fe, New Mexico, and Los Angeles, California, was the first non-Native American trail to cross Nevada and remains the least known trail; and

Whereas, Traders, couriers and emigrants en route between Santa Fe and Los Angeles followed Indian trails in blazing the Spanish Trail through Clark County; and

Whereas, The journey of Antonio Armijo, a trader from New Mexico, through Nevada in 1829 and 1830 linked the historic 1776 routes of the Dominguez-Escalante expedition through Utah and the Garces' exploration into Southern California and used a portion of the 1826 and 1827 routes of Jedediah Smith to California; and

Whereas, Antonio Armijo was the first to link the interior of the southwest with the California coast successfully, thus opening a commercial trade route, approximately 1,121 miles long, that functioned between 1829 and 1848 as the main artery connecting the interior to the coast which later became known as the Old Spanish Trail and is so named in modern literature; and

neers was commissioned in 1843 by the War Department to find and map the Oregon Trail, an assignment which he completed successfully; and

Whereas, After documenting the Oregon Trail, Captain Fremont, in an effort to expand his government's knowledge about California, pushed south through Northern Nevada into California; and

Whereas, In 1844, Fremont sought the Spanish Trail to guide his party eastward from California and followed the trail through California and Nevada to his point of departure from Utah Lake the previous year; and

Whereas, The route of the trail Fremont followed from California, which he named the Spanish Trail in the report of his expedition that he filed with the War Department, led him across Southern Nevada from Stump Spring to the Virgin River via Mountain Springs Pass, Blue Diamond, Las Vegas Springs and the Muddy River; and

Whereas, This route was previously pioneered by traders from New Mexico who spoke Spanish, a fact used by Captain Fremont in designating the "Camino de California" or "Camino de Nuevo Mexico" as the Spanish Trail; and

Whereas, Fremont's report and map were so important to the plans of the United States for Western expansion that the United States Senate and House of Representatives each printed 10,000 copies of the report and map; and

Whereas, Copies of the report and map were available to thousands of emigrants heading westward to California who came to know the route they followed as Fremont's Spanish Trail; and

Whereas, The pioneers who used Fremont's route became familiar with the promising potential of Southern Nevada for settlement which led specifically to the founding of Las Vegas or "The Meadows," whose name reflects its importance as a major camp site along the Spanish Trail; and

Whereas, The Old Spanish Trail is the foundation of succeeding routes of transport and travel through Southern Nevada including the Mormon Road, portions of the routes of the San Pedro, Los Angeles and Salt Lake Railroad and the Union Pacific Railroad which succeeded it, and the Arrowhead Trail Highway and its successors U.S. Highway No. 91 and Interstate Highway No. 15; and

Whereas, This historic route for travelers facilitated expansion of the boundaries of the United States to include New Mexico, Colorado, Utah, Arizona, Nevada and California; and

Whereas, The Spanish Trail was preferred by Kit Carson when carrying military dispatches in 1848 to Washington, D.C., which first brought news of gold at Sutter's Fort and resulted in the Gold Rush of 1849; and

Whereas, Information about this ancient route of trade and commerce is still limited, and much more can be learned about the Old Spanish Trail; now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of Nevada, Jointly, That the members of the Nevada Legislature do hereby urge the Congress of the United States to adopt legislation that dedicates the Old Spanish Trail and the Antonio Armijo Route of the Old Spanish Trail as a National Historic Trail; and be it further

Resolved, That such a designation would help ensure the protection and interpretation of the Old Spanish Trail in a more consistent and coordinated manner, would encourage tourists to visit the communities, landscape features and other resources along the trail, would help visitors gain a better understanding of how a journey along the trail might have been more than 100 years ago, and would enhance and promote knowledge concerning the early settlers and explorers who emigrated and led expeditions to the Western United States; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate prepare and transmit a copy of this resolution to the Vice President of the United States as the presiding officer of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives and each member of the Nevada Congressional Delegation; and be it further

Resolved, That this resolution becomes effective upon passage.

POM-75. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Nevada relative to increasing federal funding for special education; to the Committee on Appropriations.

ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION NO. 1

Whereas, The Education for All Handicapped Children Act of 1975, now known as the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (IDEA), was enacted by the Congress of the United States to ensure that all children with disabilities have available to them a free and appropriate public education; and

Whereas, In 1975, Congress promised state and local governments that it would fund 40 percent of the costs of providing special education and related services to children with disabilities; and

Whereas, Congress has never appropriated funds equivalent to the authorized level, has never exceeded the 15 percent level and has usually appropriated funding at only about the 8 percent level; and

Whereas, The State of Nevada is committed to providing a free and appropriate public education to children with disabilities to meet their unique needs; and

Whereas, The costs associated with serving children with disabilities continue to rise, and meeting those substantial costs requires a strong partnership between local, state and federal governmental agencies; and

Whereas, The failure of Congress to fund special education programs as it promised has forced the states to utilize funding from other necessary local and state programs to attempt to provide these special educational services; now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of Nevada, Jointly, That the Nevada Legislature hereby urges the President and Congress of the United States to increase federal funding for special education to the 40 percent level authorized by the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act so that the State of Nevada and other states can fully meet the needs of children with disabilities; and be it further

Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly prepare and transmit a copy of this resolution to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States as the presiding officer of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, each member of the Nevada Congressional Delegation and the Superintendent of Public Instruction for the State of Nevada; and be it further

Resolved, That this resolution becomes effective upon passage.

POM-76. A concurrent resolution adopted by the House of the Legislature of the State of Missouri relative to establishing a federal energy policy; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

RESOLUTION

Whereas, the recent dramatic increase in utility rates for utility companies providing heating fuels has had a devastating financial effect on many middle and low income Missourians who cannot afford to pay utility bills which have more than doubled in recent months; and

Whereas, many Missourians on fixed and limited incomes may be forced to eliminate other essential purchases, such as food and medicines, from their limited budgets in order to pay the exorbitant utility bills; and

Whereas, due to the extraordinary circumstances in which Missourians find themselves, members of Congress should consider taking extraordinary steps to protect the interests of all of the people of the United States; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the members of the House of Representatives of the Ninety-first General Assembly, First Regular Session, the Senate concurring therein, hereby request that the United States Congress consider establishing a strong remedial federal energy policy that delegates emergency powers to individual states; and be it further

Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Missouri House of Representatives be instructed to prepare properly inscribed copies of this resolution for the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives and each member of the Missouri Congressional delegation.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. DORGAN (for himself, Mr. DASCHLE, Mr. JOHNSON, Mrs. MURRAY, and Mr. WELLSTONE):

S. 966. A bill to amend the National Telecommunications and Information Administration Organization Act to encourage deployment of broadband service to rural America; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, today I rise, along with Senator DASCHLE, Senator JOHNSON, Senator MURRAY, and Senator WELLSTONE to introduce the Rural Broadband Enhancement Act to deploy broadband technology to rural America. As the demand for high speed Internet access grows, numerous companies are responding in areas of dense population. While urban America is quickly gaining high speed access, rural America is, once again, being left behind. Ensuring that all Americans have the technological capability is essential in this digital age. It is not only an issue of fairness, but it is also an issue of economic survival.

To remedy the gap between urban and rural America, this legislation gives new authority to the Rural Utilities Service in consultation with NTIA to make low interest loans to companies that are deploying broadband technology to rural America. Loans are made on a company neutral and a technology neutral basis so that companies that want to serve these areas can do so by employing technology that is best suited to a particular area. Without this program, market forces will pass by much of America, and that is unacceptable.

This issue is not a new one. When we were faced with electrifying all of the country, we enacted the Rural Electrification Act. When telephone service was only being provided to well-populated communities, we expanded the Rural Electrification Act and created the Rural Utilities Service to oversee rural telephone deployment. The equitable deployment of broadband services is only the next step in keeping America connected, and our legislation would ensure that.

If we fail to act, rural America will be left behind once again. As the economy moves further and further towards online transactions and communications, rural America must be able to participate. Historically, our economy has been defined by geography, and we in Congress were powerless to do anything about it. Where there were ports, towns and businesses got their start. Where there were railroad tracks, towns and businesses grew up around them. The highway system brought the same evolution.

But the Internet is changing all of that. No longer must economic growth be defined by geographic fiat. Telecommunications industries and policymakers are proclaiming, "Distance is dead!" But, that's not quite right: Distance will be dead, only as long as Congress ensures that broadband services are available to all parts of America, urban and rural.

I look forward to working with my colleagues to pass this legislation and give rural America a fair chance to survive.

By Mr. BOND.

S. 967. A bill to establish the Military Readiness Investigation Board, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Armed Services.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I rise today to discuss a very important matter of national security.

Today many thousands of Americans are spread across the globe defending our national interest and those of our close friends and allies.

While risking their lives to keep America safe, American soldiers sailors, airmen and marines are not as ready for combat as they should be.

History has taught us that the more prepared we are for war, the less likely potential enemies will be to risk war in pursuit of their own national objectives.

Our ability to prevail in war is, therefore, one of the most critical elements of our deterrence strategy.

That is why I rise today to introduce legislation that I believe will help us improve the combat readiness of our armed forces. Doing so will strengthen America's standing and security in the world and contribute to global stability.

In recent years the topic of military readiness has received far more words than deeds. In all candor, we have talked this issue to death without being able to deliver for the troops who need our help.

I think I know why. Words are far cheaper than the actions needed to restore a sharp edge to our combat forces.

We know that we have problem with military readiness. It seems that every time we peel back the cheery assessments and closely examine the issue, we find that our military readiness is worse than advertised.

Let me offer just a few examples.

Today, the readiness level of too many of our aviation combat units is being maintained through cannibalization. One plane is striped of parts to keep others flying. The only problem with that is the practice actually accelerates the destruction of our combat readiness. A recent Navy investigation stated "current readiness levels are being achieved through extensive cannibalization and the rates are increasing in every community we visited."

In other words, we have a bunch of hangar queens that have been robbed of parts and are not able to fly to provide the practice or to carry out the missions for which they were intended. Because of a shortage in money, our fliers are going into harm's way with outdated electronic intelligence files. The Navy E-2C Hawkeyes carry intelligence files that, in some case, are between 5 and 9 years old. The electronic intelligence files aboard the EA-6B Prowler planes, our jammers, are updated only on a 2-to-6-year cycle. The missiles we use to kill enemy radars are not being updated with new electronic intelligence parametric files.

The Army's Third Infantry Division based at Fort Stewart Georgia was recently dropped to the second lowest readiness rating. Just over a year ago, two other Army divisions, the 10th Mountain and First Mechanized Division were briefly dropped to the lowest readiness rating—meaning they were unready for war. These are three of the Army's ten active duty divisions.

The Marine Corps cannot replace its antiquated equipment because it has to steal money from its modernization account to keep its combat edge sharp.

Sadly, there is an endless parade of anecdotal evidence. And too often, the anecdotal reports that leak to the press are far more accurate indicators of the true state of military readiness than the Pentagon's own internal reporting system.

The evidence strongly suggests we have not kept faith with our troops who risk their lives for us. And that is our top obligation—to keep up our part of the social compact with our servicemen and women, in exchange for their willingness to risk their lives we promise to equip and train our troops so they may quickly prevail in combat with as few casualties as possible.

While we know all too well the problem we face, we have yet to build a national consensus of the solution. And make no mistake, that is what a problem of this scale requires—a national consensus.

To do that, we need an objective assessment of military readiness conducted by non-partisan, military experts. It would measure the current state of our U.S. military readiness and also examine the effectiveness of the Pentagon's current readiness reporting system.

Much like the CIA required an outside panel of "Team B" experts during the 1970s, I believe the Pentagon desperately needs an outside group of experts to look at the readiness books.

I believe that this review will help senior Pentagon officials obtain the most accurate picture possible of the true state of military readiness today.

Such a measurement will also help Congress build a baseline understanding of military readiness that we must have if we are to begin funding the military's operations and maintenance accounts at a sufficient level.

Let me just say this: Secretary Rumsfeld's decision to reexamine our national military strategy, force structure and procurement strategy is the right thing to do. Indeed, it is long overdue and I commend the administration for its commitment to this effort.

This is very important, but we cannot overlook combat readiness as the most critical index of our Nation's ability to defend itself, our interests and our allies' interests. Strategic competitors pay close attention to reports of deteriorating U.S. military readiness and we must not embolden them by ignoring these reports ourselves.

Many military experts have also contended that many of the military's readiness problems would disappear if the Pentagon dropped its plans to fight and win two major regional wars at one time. However, some say that the Nation's ability to wage major wars on two fronts acts as an important deterrent to potentially hostile states like North Korea. Secretary Rumsfeld's review coupled with a military readiness review panel should enable us for once to answer effectively and address these issues—to come up with the right balance and solutions for our troops and for our Nation.

The readiness system is intended to pinpoint war-fighting deficiencies in every unit's equipment, transportation system, personnel and training. By many accounts this system is arcane and inflexible and does not accurately depict the true state of readiness. It is time we reviewed this system and developed means to keep it the predictive and useful tool it was designed and intended to be.

While we await the results of Secretary Rumsfeld's reviews, we already know that we have a persistent readiness problem that exacerbates other problems within the U.S. military, like manpower levels and morale.

In a monthly readiness report the defense department sent to Congress in March, there was a list of "strategic concerns" about military readiness. This report indicated that despite some leveling off of declines in wartime preparedness, there is still an uphill battle to be fought to ensure U.S. Forces are ready for major operations. This report states that aviation readiness remains challenged by "reduced aircraft mission-capable rates, parts shortages, and technical surprises and maintenance issues."

Readiness involves very many distinct issues. First, it's making sure that we're providing the resources needed to maintain readiness. Second, it's making sure that we are gathering the right data and information so that we've got true pictures of readiness. Third, it's dealing quickly and effectively with readiness issues when they're detected.

Several weeks ago I released an article describing the legislation I am proposing here. As a result, I have received numerous letters from constituents reiterating the need for this review board and citing examples of why it should be done. One letter was sent by a woman who has a daughter and two friends who are serving on various Navy bases. In her letter she describes a situation where there are not enough spare parts to go around. Nothing new—except this affects her personally and causes her to worry constantly about her family and friends because they are spread too thin and lack the spare parts to do their job, thereby endangering them needlessly.

At the end of the cold war, force structure and personnel end strength were drastically cut in all the services. At the same time, the Nation discovered that the post-cold war world is a complex, dangerous place. As a result, deployments for contingency operations, peacekeeping missions, humanitarian assistance, disaster relief and counter-terrorism operations increased dramatically and our dependence on the armed services for their deployments continues to grow.

While our military forces got smaller, they did not become more ready for combat. In fact, our peak military readiness was reached immediately following Desert Storm in 1991 and has slowly and steadily declined since.

And that is inexcusable for a superpower. We have a responsibility to our citizens and to countless millions around the world whose physical safety and economic and political stability is guaranteed because of our military strength.

The world looks to us, and so as I review this military readiness problem and search for a solution I am guided by the simple notion that our strength guarantees global peace. Our military strength provides the foundation for the global economy and provides the economic and political stability for so many parts of the world. This understanding must guide our efforts as we seek to rebuild our military to prevail in our next war.

Our own history during this century has shown us that when we try to judge our military by its cost-efficiency during peacetime we invite disaster. This happened at the outset of the Second World War in North Africa. And we saw it again when Task Force Smith was shredded by the North Koreans in 1950.

How many times must we relearn the lesson that the only true measure of military effectiveness is performance in wartime?

I commend to my colleagues a brilliant editorial in the Wall Street Journal by Mark Helprin. He writes of the myopic view of peacetime civilians charged with budgeting their militaries. "God save the American soldier from those who believe that his life can be protected and his mission accomplished on the cheap," wrote Mr. Helprin. "For what they perceive as extravagance is always less costly in lives and treasure than the long drawn-out wars it deters or shortens with quick victories."

I should explain that the bill I have introduced establishes a commission to be appointed by the Secretary of Defense with the concurrence of the chairs and ranking members of the authorizing appropriations committees to look at the issues of readiness and to be sure that they report to the Congress and to the United States, No. 1, on the status of readiness and, No. 2, on the reliability, or lack thereof, in the system set up to determine readiness.

I respect the great work being done by the Readiness Subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee. I have spoken with the chair and ranking members. We want to be a supplement to and a sounding board, perhaps, to provide a louder microphone or megaphone for the information determined in that Readiness Subcommittee.

I hope my colleagues will look at this measure and join me in sponsoring it. I am pleased to ask unanimous consent that the distinguished occupant of the chair, the Senator from Kansas, Mr. ROBERTS, be listed as a cosponsor.

I invite other colleagues who have an interest in this to look at it and join with me. I hope and trust we can have a strong bipartisan effort to achieve something which should be the goal and the objective of all of us.

I ask unanimous consent that two articles be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FIRE NEXT TIME
(By Mark Helprin)

From Alexandria in July of 1941, Randolph Churchill reported to his father as the British waited for Rommel to attack Egypt. In the midst of a peril that famously concentrated mind and spirit, he wrote, "You can see generals wandering around GHQ looking for bits of string."

Apparently these generals were not, like their prime minister, devoted to Napoleon's maxim, "Frappez la masse, et le reste vient par surcroit," which, vis-a-vis strategic or other problems, bids one to concentrate upon the essence, with assurance that all else will follow in train, even bits of string.

Those with more than a superficial view of American national security, who would defend and preserve it from the fire next time, have by necessity divided their forces in advocacy of its various elements, but they have neglected its essence. For the cardinal issue of national security is not China, is not Russia, is not weapons of mass destruction, or missile defense, the revolution in military affairs, terrorism, training, or readiness. It is, rather, that the general consensus in regard to defense since Pearl Harbor—that doing too much is more prudent than doing too little—has been destroyed. The last time we devoted a lesser proportion of our resources to defense, we were well protected by the oceans, in the midst of a depression, and without major international responsibilities, and even then it was a dereliction of duty.

The destruction is so influential that traditional supporters of high defense spending, bent to the will of their detractors, shrink from argument, choosing rather to negotiate among themselves so as to prepare painstakingly crafted instruments of surrender.

A leader of defense reform, whose life mission is to defend the United States, writes to me: "Please do not quote me under any circumstances by name. . . . Bush has no chance of winning the argument that more money must be spent on defense. Very few Americans feel that more money needs to be spent on defense and they are right. The amount of money being spent is already more than sufficient."

More than sufficient to fight China? It is hard to think of anything less appealing than war with China, but if we don't want that we must be able to deter China, and to deter China we must have the ability to fight China. More than sufficient to deal with simultaneous invasions of Kuwait, South Korea, and Taiwan? More than sufficient to stop even one incoming ballistic missile? Not yet, not now, and, until we spend the money, not ever.

For someone of the all-too-common opinion that a strong defense is the cause of war, a favorite trick is to advance a wholesale revision of strategy, so that he may accomplish his depredations while looking like a reformer. This pattern is followed instinctively by the French when they are in alliance and by the left when it is trapped within the democratic order. But to do so one need be neither French nor on the left.

Neville Chamberlain, who was neither, starved the army and navy on the theory that the revolution in military affairs of his time made the only defense feasible that a "Fortress Britain" protected by the Royal Air Force—and then failed in building up the air force. Bill Clinton, who is not French, and who came into office calling for the discontinuance of heavy echelons in favor of power projection, simultaneously pressed for a severe reduction in aircraft carriers, the sine qua non of power projection. Later, he and his strategical toadies embraced the revolution in military affairs not for its virtues but because even the Clinton-ravished military "may be unaffordable," and "advanced technology offers much greater military efficiency."

This potential efficiency is largely unfamiliar to the general public. For example, current miniaturized weapons may seem elephantine after advances in extreme ultraviolet lithography equip guidance and control systems with circuitry not 0.25 microns but 0.007 microns wide, a 35-fold reduction that will make possible the robotization of arms, from terminally guided and target-identifying bullets to autonomous tank killers that fly hundreds of miles, burrow into the ground, and sleep like locusts until they are awakened by the seismic signature of enemy armor.

Lead-magnesium-niobate transducers in broadband sonars are likely to make the seas perfectly transparent, eliminating for the first time the presumed invulnerability of submarine-launched ballistic missiles, the anchor of strategic nuclear stability. The steady perfection of missile guidance has long made nearly everything the left says about nuclear disarmament disingenuous or uninformed, and the advent of metastable explosives creates the prospect of a single B-1 bomber carrying the non-nuclear weapons load of 450 B-17s, the equivalent of 26,800 100-pound bombs. Someday, we will have these things, or, if we abstain, our potential enemies will have them and we will not.

To field them will be more expensive than fielding less miraculous weapons, which cannot simply be abandoned lest an enemy exploit the transition, and which will remain as indispensable as the rifleman holding his ground, because the nature of war is counter-miraculous. And yet, when the revolution in military affairs is still mainly academic, we have cut recklessly into the staple forces.

God save the American soldier from those who believe that his life can be protected and his mission accomplished on the cheap. For what they perceive as extravagance is always less costly in lives and treasure than the long drawn-out wars it deters altogether or shortens with quick victories. In the name of their misplaced frugality we have transformed our richly competitive process of acquiring weapons into the single-supplier model of the command economies that we defeated in the Cold War, largely with the superior weapons that the idea of free and competitive markets allowed us to produce.

Though initially more expensive, producing half a dozen different combat aircraft and seeing which are best is better than decreeing that one will do the job and praying that it may. Among other things, strike aircraft have many different roles, and relying upon just one would be the same sort of economy as having Clark Gable play both Rhett Butler and Scarlett O'Hara.

Having relinquished or abandoned many foreign bases, the United States requires its warships to go quickly from place to place so as to compensate for their inadequate number, and has built them light using a lot of aluminum, which, because it can burn in air at 3,000 degrees Celsius, is used in incendiary bombs and blast furnaces. (Join the navy and see the world. You won't need to bring a toaster.)

And aluminum or not, there are too few ships. During the EP-3 incident various pinheads furthered the impression of an American naval cordon off the Chinese coast. Though in 1944 the navy kept 17 major carriers in the central Pacific alone, not long ago its assets were so attenuated by the destruction of a few Yugos disguised as tanks that for three months there was not in the vast western Pacific even a single American aircraft carrier.

What remains of the order of battle is crippled by a lack of the unglamorous, costly supports that are the first to go when there isn't enough money. Consider the floating dry dock. By putting ships back into action with minimal transit time, floating dry docks are force preservers and multipliers. In 1972, the United States had 94. Now it has 14. Though history is bitter and clear, this kind of mistake persists.

Had the allies of World War II been prepared with a sufficient number of so pedestrian a thing as landing craft, the war might have been cheated of a year and a half and many millions of lives. In 1940, the French army disposed of 530 artillery pieces, 830 antitank guns, and 235 (almost half) of its best tanks, because in 1940 the French did not think much of the Wehrmacht—until May.

How shall the United States avoid similar misjudgments? Who shall stand against the common wisdom when it is wrong about deterrence, wrong about the causes of war, wrong about the state of the world, wrong about the ambitions of ascendant nations, wrong about history, and wrong about human nature?

In the defense of the United States, doing too much is more prudent than doing too little. Though many in Congress argue this and argue it well, Congress will not follow one of its own. Though the president's appointees also argue it well, the public will wait only upon the president himself. Only he can sway a timid Congress, clear the way for his appointees, and move the country toward the restoration of its military power.

The president himself must make the argument, or all else is in vain. If he is unwilling to risk his political capital and his presidency to undo the damage of the past eight years, then in the fire next time his name will be linked with that of his predecessor, and there it will stay forever.

RUMSFELD ON HIGH WIRE OF DEFENSE REFORM

(By Thomas E. Ricks)

In his first four months at the Pentagon, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has launched a score of secretive studies and posed hundreds of tough questions as he has tried to create a new vision for the American military, looking at everything from missile defenses and global strategy to the flaws of a Truman-vintage personnel system.

Yet, in that short span, he has also rallied an unlikely collection of critics, ranging from conservative members of Congress and his predecessor as defense secretary to some of the generals who work for him. In dozens of interviews, those people expressed deep concern that Rumsfeld has acted imperiously, kept some of the top brass in the dark and failed to maintain adequate communications with Capitol Hill.

"He's blown off the Hill, he's blown off the senior leaders in the military, and he's blown off the media," said Thomas Donnelly, a defense expert at the conservative Project for the New American Century. "Is there a single group he's reached out to?"

The criticism has focused on Rumsfeld's score of study groups, staffed by retired generals and admirals and other experts who are probing everything from weapons programs to military retirement policies. In Pentagon hallways, "the Rumsfeld review," as the studies are collectively called, is mocked by some as a martial version of Hillary Rodham Clinton's health care plan, which failed spectacularly in 1994 when it was offered up to Congress.

"It's arrogant theorists behind closed doors," said one person offering the Clinton analogy, retired Army Lt. Col. Ralph Peters, now a prominent writer on military strategy.

The military is already responding in significant and striking ways. On Thursday, the Joint Chiefs of Staff held a closed-door meeting in the "Tank," their secure conference room at the Pentagon, where they posed scathing questions about Rumsfeld's intentions on strategy and possible cuts to the Army, defense officials said. Yesterday, retired Gen. Gordon Sullivan, a former Army chief of staff, delivered an angry speech assailing the apparent direction of Rumsfeld's reforms as "imprudent."

One point on which both Rumsfeld and his critics agree is the gravity of his reform effort. Reshaping the military to meet the new threats of the 21st century—and to keep the U.S. armed forces by far the strongest in the world—was a key campaign pledge of President Bush. To be successful, Rumsfeld must not only come up with specific answers but also find enough support in Congress and across the military to fund them and carry them out. The job will be made all the more difficult because the reforms could anger members of Congress by closing bases, terminating major weapons programs and shifting some spending from tanks, ships and aircraft into newer areas such as space and missile defenses.

In an extensive interview in his Pentagon office last week, Rumsfeld argued that his review has been necessary, rational and inclusive, involving more than 170 meetings with 44 generals and admirals. "Everyone who wants to be briefed I think has been briefed," he said. "Everyone cannot be involved in everything."

Far from reaching concrete conclusions behind closed doors, he said, he simply has been posing questions about how to change the military to deal with a world where even Third World nations can buy long-range missiles, terrorists have attacked sites inside the United States, and the American economy is increasingly reliant on vulnerable satellites. "I've got a lot of thoughts, but I don't have a lot of answers," he said.

Overall, Rumsfeld swung in the interview between being conciliatory toward his critics and being dismissive of them. "Is change hard for people? Yeah," he said sympathetically. "Is the anticipation of change even harder? Yeah."

But a moment later he added: "The people it shakes up may very well be people who don't have enough to do. They're too busy getting shook up. They should get out there and get to work."

BRUSQUE STYLE

Rumsfeld, a bright, impatient man who is not a schmoozer by nature, spent years as an executive in the pharmaceutical industry and honed a top-down management style. That approach may be the only way to overhaul America's huge and conservative military establishment. But his brusque manner has exacerbated anxiety about change in the Pentagon and could, in the end, undercut his effort.

Generals who have met with him report that communications tend to be one way. "He takes a lot in, but he doesn't give anything back," one said. "You go and brief him, and it's just blank."

Neither that general nor any other Pentagon official critical of Rumsfeld would agree to be quoted by name. Indeed, one said Rumsfeld's aides would "have my tongue" were it known that he had talked to a reporter.

Many of those interviewed said they are worried that the future of the institution to which they have devoted their adult lives is being decided without them. One senior general unfavorably compared Rumsfeld's stewardship of the Pentagon with Colin L. Powell's performance as secretary of state. "Mr. Powell is very inclusive, and Mr. Rumsfeld is the opposite," said the general, who knows both men. "We've been kept out of the loop."

Added another senior officer: "The fact is, he is disenfranchising people."

Some noted that the Bush administration came into office vowing to restore the military's trust in its civilian overseers. "Everyone in the military voted for these guys, and now they feel like they aren't being trusted," a Pentagon official said.

The Army, which has the reputation of being the most doggedly obedient of all the services, appears to be closest to going into opposition against the new regime. Army generals are especially alarmed by rumors that they could lose one or two of their 10 active divisions under the new Pacific-oriented strategy that Rumsfeld appears to be moving toward but has not yet unveiled.

At the Joint Chiefs' "Tank" session on Thursday, one defense official said, the Army led the charge against the conclusions of a Rumsfeld study group on conventional weapons that suggested big cuts in Army troops. The service chiefs told their chairman, Gen. Henry H. Shelton, that they could not make sense of that recommendation without knowing precisely what strategy Rumsfeld wants to pursue. "It wasn't just the Army, but [Army officers] took the lead" in the criticism, the official added.

Retired generals often say in public what the active-duty leadership is thinking but can't utter. Sullivan, the former Army chief, appeared to play that role yesterday in a speech to a conference of Army reservists. He said he is worried that Rumsfeld would "propose a world in which we will be able to hide behind our missile defense," which he went on to liken to the expensive but useless Maginot Line that France erected against Germany after World War I.

In another recent talk, Sullivan referred to Rumsfeld's new emphasis on space as a "rat-hole" for defense spending. He also sent an email criticizing Rumsfeld, and that message has circulated widely inside the Army.

WARY GENERALS

The military now appears so wary of Rumsfeld that officers perceive slights where none may have been intended. The generals are especially peeved by what they believe is a pattern of moves by Rumsfeld to reallocate power from the military to himself.

Earlier this month, for example, Rumsfeld dumped his military assistant, a one-star admiral who had been picked for the job just four months earlier, and replaced him with a three-star admiral. "It turned out I made a mistake, just to be blunt about it, thinking that a one-star could, simply because he was in the secretary's office, get the place to move at the same pace that a three-star could or a two-star," Rumsfeld explained. In other words, one flag officer commented, Rumsfeld felt he needed someone who could crack the whip over the top brass.

Rumsfeld also caused a stir in the services by bringing in retired Vice Adm. Staser Holcomb, who was his military assistant during his first term as secretary of defense, under President Gerald R. Ford, to look over the current crop of generals and admirals. Holcomb's queries may indicate that Rumsfeld wants to take over the selection of top generals—one of the last prerogatives left to the service chiefs. The chiefs generally have little say about operational matters, which are the province of the regional commanders, or "CinCs," and they don't have much sway over weapons acquisition, which is a civilian responsibility. But they do get to pick who joins the club of top generals.

Rumsfeld said Holcomb is working on military personnel matters, especially in helping him look at who should become the next chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff when Shelton steps down later this year. Asked whether he is stepping on the toes of the service chiefs by getting involved in the selection of two- and three-star generals, Rumsfeld grinned and laughed, but said nothing.

Rumsfeld has also been planning to start a new "Crisis Coordination Center" to be overseen by his office, defense officials said. They report that Rumsfeld believes that communications and responsibilities during crises have been handled hazily. Creating such a center—a move that has not previously been reported—almost certainly would diminish the power of the staff of the Joint Chiefs, which oversees operations.
